REVERBERATORY FURNACE, a furnace with a domed roof, from which the flames of the fire are reflected upon the vessel placed within; used extensively for smelting metals.

REVERE, PAUL, American patriot, born in Boston, U.S., bred a goldsmith; conspicuous for his zeal against the mother-country, and one of the first actors in the revolt (1735-1818).

REVEREND, a title of respect given to the clergy. Very Reverend to deans, Right Reverend to bishops, and Most Reverend to archbishops.

REVERERING LAYER, a cloud of smoke like haze surrounding the photosphere of the sun; the layer is of lower temperature than the underlying layers and absorbs part of the radiation, giving rise to the dark lines in the solar spectrum.

REVIVAL OF LETTERS, revival in Europe in the 15th century of the study of classical, especially Greek, literature, chiefly by the arrival in Italy of certain learned Greeks, fugitives from Constantinople on its capture by the Turks in 1453, and promoted, by the invention of printing, to the gradual extinction of the dry, barren scholasticism previously in vogue. See RENAISSANCE.

REVIVALS, waves of religious enthusiasm worked up by powerful preachers. In the middle of the 18th century the Wesley brothers and Whitefield met with great success with their open-air preaching, and subsequent revivalists have largely followed their methods. Of these Sankey, Moody, Torrey and Alexander, and Aimee McPherson have been the most famous. Some recent revivals have been accompanied by great emotionalism, and in America have been tainted with commercialism.

REVOLUTION, a sudden change for most part in the constitution of a country in consequence of internal revolt, particularly when a monarchy is superseded by a republic, as in France in 1789, in 1848, and 1870, that in 1830 being merely from one branch of the Bourbon family to another, such as that also in England in 1688. The French Revolution of 1789 is the revolution by pre-eminence, and the years 1848-1849 were years of revolutions in Europe, as were 1917 and 1918.

REVUE, a form of musical entertainment in a series of unconnected scenes without pretence at a plot; topical events and personalities play a prominent part; revues were first popular during the Great War when a large section of the public had no mind for more serious or thought-provoking entertainment.

REVUE DES DEUX MONDES, a celebrated French review, devoted to literature, science, art, politics, &c., established in 1820, and conducted afterwards by Buloz.

REYBAUD, MARIE BOCH LOUIS, a versatile litterateur and politician, born in Marseilles; travelled in India, established himself as a Radical journalist in Paris in 1829 and edited important works of travel, wrote popular novels, published important studies in social science; elected a member of the Academy of Moral Sciences (1850); was an active politician, and investigated for government the agricultural colonies in Algeria; author of "Scenes in Modern Life," and "Industry in Europe" (1799-1879).

REYKJAVIK (i.e. rocky town), capital of Iceland, situated in a barren, desolate region on the SW. coast; has a cathedral, and is the see of a bishop.

REYNARD THE FOX, an epic of the Middle Ages, in which animals represent men, "full of broad rustic mirth, inexhaustible in comic devices, a world Saturnalia, where wolves disguised into monks and nigh starved by short commons, force pilgrimages to Rome for absolution, cooks pleading at the judgment-bar, make strange mummery." The principal characters are Isengrim the wolf and Reynard the fox, the former representing strength incarnated in the baron and the latter representing cunning incarnated in the Church, and the strife for ascendancy between the two, one in which, though frequently hard pressed, the latter gets the advantage in the end.

REYNOLDS, JOHN FULTON, an American general, born in Lancaster, Pennsylvania; graduated at 21 at West Point, entered the army, distinguished himself during the Civil War, especially at the second battle of Bull Run; was killed at the battle of Gettysburg (1820-1863).

REYNOLDS, SIR JOSEPH, the chief of English portrait-painters, born near Plymouth; went to London in 1740 to study art, and remained three years; visited Italy and the great centres of art there, when he lost his hearing, and settled in London in 1752, where he began to paint portraits, and had as the subjects of his art the most distinguished people; numbered among his friends all the literary notabilities of the day; he was the first President of the Royal Academy, and though it was no part of his duty, delivered a succession of discourses to the students on the principles and practice of painting, 15 of which have been published and are still held in high esteem (1723-1792).

REHADOMANCY, a species of divination by means of a hazel rod to trace the presence of minerals or metals under ground.

REHADAMANTHUS, in the Greek mythology a son of Zeus and Europa, and a brother of Minos (q.v.); was distinguished among men for his strict justice, and was after his death appointed one of the judges of the dead in the nether world along with Aeacus and Minos.

REHAPODISTS, a class of minstrels who in early times wandered over the Greek cities reciting the poems of Homer, and through whom the latter became widely known and came to be translated with such completeness.

RHEA, in the Greek mythology a goddess, the daughter of Uranus and Gaea, the wife of Kronos, and mother of the chief Olympian deities, Zeus, Pluto, Poseidon, Hera, Demeter, and Hestia, and identified by the Greeks of Asia Minor with the great earth goddess Cybele, whose worship as such, like that of all the other earth deities, was accompanied with wild revelry.

RHEA SILVIA, a vestal virgin, the mother of Romulus and Remus, twins, whom she bore to Mars, the god of war, who had violated her.

RHEIMS, an important French city in the department of Marne, on the Vesle, 100 m. N.E. of Paris; as the former ecclesiastical metropolis of France it has historical associations of peculiar interest; the French monarchs were crowned in its cathedral (a Gothic structure of unique beauty) from 1179 to 1825; has a beautiful 12th-century Romanesque church, an archiepiscopal palace, a Roman triumphal arch, a Lycée, statues, &c.; situated in a rich wine district, it is one of the chief champagne entrepôts, and is also one of the main centres of French textiles, especially woollen goods; is strongly fortified. Entered by German troops in September, 1914, and sacked by them before being evacuated after nine days; the city was constantly bombarded for the next four years owing to the proximity of the enemy; this bombardment almost destroyed the cathedral, which was restored afterwards.

RHEINGAU, a fruitful wine district in the Rhine Valley, stretching along the bank of the river in Hesse-Nassau; has a sunny, sheltered situation, and its wines are famed for their quality.

RHENISH PRUSSIA, the most westerly and most densely populated of the Prussian provinces, lies within the valleys of the Rhine and the Lower Moselle, and borders on Belgium and the Netherlands; is mountainous and forest-clad, except in the fertile plains of the N. and in the rich river valleys, where vines, cereals, and vegetables are extensively cultivated; large quantities of coal, iron, zinc, and lead are mined; as an industrial and manufacturing province it ranks first in Germany; Coblenz (capital), Aix-la-Chapelle, Bonn, and Cologne are among its chief towns; was formed in 1815 out of several smaller duchies.

REHOBOTH, a variable resistance placed in an electrical circuit to regulate the current flowing through it.

REHUS, a monkey held sacred in several parts of India.

REHETORIC, the science or art of persuasive or effective speech, written as well as spoken, which, both in theory and practice, was cultivated to great perfection among the ancient Greeks and Romans, and to some extent in the Middle Ages and later, but is much less cultivated either as a science or an art to-day.

REHNE, one of the chief rivers of Europe; of several small Alpine head-streams, the Neerer and the Farther Rhine are the two principal, issuing from the eastern flanks of Mount St. Gothard; a junction is formed at Reichenau, whence the united stream—the Upper Rhine—flows N. to Lake Constance, and issuing from the NW. corner curves westward to Basel, forming the boundary between Switzerland and Germany. From Basel, as the Middle Rhine, it pursues a northerly course to Mainz, turns sharply to the W. as far as Rhenen, and again resumes its northward course. The Rhine-Highland between Bingen and Bonn is the most romantic and picturesque part of its course. As the Lower Rhine it flows in a sluggish, winding stream through the Rhenish Lowlands, enters Holland near Cleves, at Nimeguen bends to the W., and flowing through Holland some 100 m. reaches the North Sea, splitting in its lowest part into several streams which form a rich delta, one-third of Holland. It is 800 m. in length; receives numerous affluents, e.g. Neckar, Main, Moselle, Lippe; is navigable for ships to Mannheim.

REHNE, OCCUPATION OF THE. Under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles the territory of the left of the Rhine was to be occupied by Allied troops for 15 years from 1919, prior to which evacuation would be gradual; British, American, French, and Belgian troops were all represented; America withdrew in 1920; Britain remained at Cologne till 1925, when headquarters was transferred to Wiesbaden; in 1929 all British troops were withdrawn, and by 1930 total evacuation was effected.

RHINOPLASTIC OPERATION, an operation of repairing destroyed portions of the nose by skin from adjoining parts.

RHODE ISLAND, the smallest but most densely populated of the United States, and one of the original 13; faces the Atlantic between Connecticut W. and Massachusetts (N. and E.); is split into two portions by Narragansett Bay (30 m. long); hilly in the N., but elsewhere level; enjoys a mild and equable climate, and is greatly resorted to by invalids from the S.; the soil is rather poor, and manufactures form the staple industry; coal, iron, and limestone are found. Providence, Pawtucket, and Newport are the chief towns.

RHODES, or RHODOS, an island in the Mediterranean, 12 m. distant from the SW. coast of Asia Minor, area 49 m. by 21 m.; mountainous and woody; has a fine climate and a fertile soil, which produces fruit in abundance, also some grain; it is ill-developed, and has a retrogressive population, most of whom are Greeks; sponges, chief export; figures considerably in ancient classic history; was occupied by the Knights Hospitallers of St. John for more than two centuries, and was taken from them by the Turks in 1523.

RHODES, CECIL JOHN, statesman, born in Hertfordshire, son of a vicar; went to South Africa; became director of the diamond mines at Kimberley, and amassed a large fortune; entered the Cape Parliament, and became Prime Minister in 1890; he was active and successful in extending the British territories in South Africa, aiming at destroying race prejudices, and at establishing among the different colonies a federated union. He resigned in 1896 after the Jameson Raid, but acting as a private individual he quelled a Matabele revolt and in the Boer War fought at Kimberley (1883-1902).

RHODESIA, a British colony in S. Africa divided into N. Rhodesia and S. Rhodesia, stretching from Lake Tanganyika and the Congo to the river Limpopo; it is named after Cecil Rhodes, founder of the British South Africa Company which at one time administered the country; it is traversed by the Zambesi, which divides it into Northern and Southern Rhodesia; the Northern is less developed, though the land is cultivated, crops raised, and cattle-breeding commenced, besides a new industry started in fibre; the Southern is divided into two provinces, Mashonaland (q.v.) and Matabeleland (q.v.); it is favourable to the breeding of stock, though the rinderpest raged in it disastrously for a time; the climate is suitable for the cultivation of cereals of all kinds, and vegetables, tobacco, india-rubber, and indigo are indigenous, and well repay cultivation; there are forests of timber and gold, silver, copper, coal, tin, &c., have been discovered.

RHOMBUS, a quadrilateral with all its sides equal; its diagonals bisect one another at right angles.

RHONDDA, 1ST VISCOUNT (D. A. Thomas), British industrialist and politician. Industrially he was one of the largest of Welsh coalowners; he entered the House of Commons as a Liberal in 1888, was President of the Local Government Board in 1916, and Food Controller in 1917; he was raised to the peerage in 1916 (1856-1918).

REHNE, one of the four great rivers of France, rises on Mount St. Gothard, in the Swiss Alps; passes through the Lake of Geneva, and flowing in a south-westerly course to Lyons, is there joined by its chief affluent, the Saône, hence it flows due S.; at Arles it divides into two streams, which form a rich delta before entering the Gulf of Lyons, in the Mediterranean; length, 504 m.; navigable to Lyons, but the rapid current and shifting sandbanks greatly impede traffic.

RHÔNE, a department of France lying wholly within the western side of the Saône and Rhône basin, hilly and fruitful; wine is produced in large quantities; has an active industrial population; capital, Lyons.

RICHARD I. (surnamed Cœur de Lion), king of England from 1189 to 1199, second son and successor of Henry II.; his early years were spent in Poitou and Aquitaine, where he engaged in quarrels with his father; after his accession to the throne he flung himself with characteristic ardour into the Crusade movement; in 1190 joined his forces with Philip Augustus of France in the third crusade; upheld the claims of Tancred in Sicily; captured Cyprus, and won great renown in the Holy Land, particularly by his defeat of Saladin; was captured after shipwreck on the coast on his way home by the Archduke of Austria, and handed over to the Emperor Henry VI. (1193); was ransomed at a heavy price by his subjects, and landed in England in 1194; his later years were spent in his French possessions warring against Philip, and he died of an arrow wound at the siege of Chalus; not more than a year of his life was spent in England, and his reign is barren of constitutional change (1157-1199).

RICHARD II., king of England from 1377 to 1399, son of the Black Prince, born in Bordeaux; succeeded his grandfather, Edward III.; during his minority till 1389 the kingdom was administered by a council; in 1381 the Peasants' Revolt broke out, headed by Wat Tyler, as a result of the discontent occasioned by the Statutes of Labour passed in the previous reign, and more immediately by the heavy taxation made necessary by the expense of the Hundred Years' War still going on with France; a corrupt Church called forth the energetic protests of Wycliffe, which started the Lollard (q.v.) movement; an invasion of Scotland (1385), resulting in the capture of Edinburgh, was headed by the young king; coming under French influence, and adopting despotic measures in the later years of his reign, Richard estranged all sections of his people; a rising headed by Henry of Lancaster forced his abdication, and by a decree of Parliament he was imprisoned for life in Pontefract Castle, where he died (probably murdered) soon after (1367-1400).

RICHARD III., king of England from 1483 to 1485, youngest brother of Edward IV., and last of the Plantagenets, Duke of Fotheringhay Castle; in 1461 was created Duke of Gloucester by his brother for assisting him to win the crown; faithfully supported Edward against Lancastrian attacks; married (1473) Anne, daughter of Warwick, the King-Maker; early in 1483 was appointed Protector of the kingdom and guardian of his young nephew, Edward V.; put to death nobles who stood in the way of his ambitious schemes for the throne; doubts were cast upon the legitimacy of the young king, and Richard's right to the throne was asserted; in July, 1483, he assumed the kingly office; almost certainly instigated the murder of Edward and his little brother in the Tower; ruled firmly and well, but without the confidence of the nation; in 1485 Henry, Earl of Richmond, head of the House of Lancaster, invaded England, and at the battle of Bosworth Richard was defeated and slain (1462-1485).

RICHARD OF CIRENCESTER, an English chronicler, born in Cirencester; flourished in the 14th century; was a monk in the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, Westminster; wrote a History of England from 447 to 1066; for long the reputed author of a remarkable work on Roman Britain, now proved to be a forgery; d. 1401.

RICHARDS, ALFRED BATE, journalist and author; turned from law to literature; author of a number of popular dramas, volumes of poems, essays, &c.; was the first editor of the Daily Telegraph, and afterwards of the Morning Advertiser; took an active interest in the volunteer movement (1820-1870).

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE, an epistle written from Corinth, in the year 59, by St. Paul to the Church at Rome to correct particularly two errors into which, he had learned, the Church there had fallen, on the part of the Jewish Christians, that the Gentiles as such were not entitled to the same privileges as themselves, and, on the other hand, of the Gentile Christians, that the Jews by their rejection of Christ had excluded themselves from God's kingdom; he wrote this epistle to show that the one had no more right to the grace of God than the other, and that this grace contemplates the final conversion of the Jews as well as the Gentiles. The great theme of this epistle is that faith in Christ is the one way of salvation for all mankind, Jew as well as Gentile, and its significance is this, that it contains if not the whole teaching of Paul, that essential part of it which presents and emphasises the all-sufficiency of this faith.

ROMANTICISM, the name of the reactionary movement in literature and art at the close of the 18th century and at the beginning of the 19th, against the cold and spiritless formalism and pseudo-classicism that then prevailed, and was more regardful of correctness of expression than truth of feeling and the claims of the emotional nature; it has been defined as the "reproduction in modern art and literature of the life and thought of the Middle Ages."

ROME, since 1871, capital of the modern kingdom of Italy (q.v.), on the Tiber, 16 m. from its entrance into the Tyrrhenian Sea; legend ascribes its foundation to Romulus in 753 B.C., and the story of its progress, first as the chief city of a little Italian kingdom, then of a powerful and expanding republic (610 B.C. to 30 B.C.), and finally of a vast empire, together with its decline and fall in the 5th century (476 A.D.), before the advancing barbarian hordes forms the most impressive chapter in the history of nations; as the mother-city of Christendom in the Middle Ages, and the later capital of the Papal States (q.v.) and seat of the Popes, it acquired fresh glory; it remains the most interesting city in the world; is filled with the sublime ruins and monuments of its pagan greatness and the priceless art-treasures of its mediæval period; of ruined buildings the most imposing are the Colosseum (a vast amphitheatre for gladiatorial shows) and the Baths of Caracalla (accommodated 1000 bathers); the great aqueducts of its pre-Christian period still supply the city with water from the Apennines and the Alban Hills; the Aurelian Wall (12 m.) still surrounds the city, enclosing the "seven hills," the Palatine, Capitoline, Aventine, &c., but suburbs have spread beyond; St. Peter's is still the finest church in the world; the Popes have their residence in the Vatican; its manufactures are inconsiderable, and consist chiefly of small mosaics, bronze and plaster casts, prints, trinkets, &c.; depends for its prosperity chiefly on the large influx of visitors, and the court expenditure of the Quirinal and Vatican, and of the civil and military officials.

RUNES, a name signifying occult and given to the letters of the alphabet by heathen Teutonic tribes prior to their coming under the influence of Roman civilisation; are formed almost invariably of straight lines, and scarcely exist except in inscriptions dating back to A.D. 1; found chiefly in Scandinavia, also in Britain. There are three runic alphabets (much alike), the oldest being the Gothic of 24 letters or runes. They are now believed to have first come into use among the Goths in the 6th century B.C., and to be a modified form of the old Greek alphabet introduced by traders.

RUNNYMEDE, a meadow on the right bank of the Thames, 36 m. SW. of London, where King John signed the Magna Charta, June 15, 1215.

RUPES, a silver coin, the monetary unit of India, whose face value is 1s. 6d.; a lac of rupees equals 100,000.

RUPERT, PRINCE, son of Frederick V., Elector Palatine, and grandson of James I. of England; received an excellent education; took part in the Thirty Years' War, and suffered three years' imprisonment at Linz; in England, at the outbreak of the Great Rebellion, he was entrusted with a command by Charles I., and by his dash and daring greatly heartened the Royalist cause, taking an active part in all the great battles; finally surrendered to Fairfax at Oxford in 1646; but two years later took command of the Royalist ships and kept up a gallant struggle till his defeat by Blake in 1651; escaped to the West Indies, where he kept up a privateering attack upon English merchantmen; came in for many honours after the Restoration, and distinguished himself in the Dutch War; the closing years of his life were quietly spent in scientific research (physical, chemical, mechanical), for which he had a distinct aptitude (1619-1682).

RUPERT'S LAND, a name given by Prince Rupert to territory along the drainage of which flows into Hudson Bay Strait; it now forms part of Manitoba and the North-West Territories.

RUSE, BENJAMIN, a noted American physician and professor, born in Byberry, near Philadelphia; studied medicine at Princeton and Edinburgh; became professor of chemistry at Philadelphia in 1789; sat in Congress, and signed the Declaration of Independence (1776); held important medical posts in the army; resigned, and assumed medical professorship in Philadelphia; won a European reputation as a lecturer, philanthropist, and medical investigator; published several treatises, and from 1799 acted as treasurer of the U.S. Mint (1748-1813).

RUSSELL, JOHN, historian and politician, born in Warkworth, Northumberland; although a barrister he never practised, but set himself to compile elaborate notes of proceedings at the Star Chamber and other courts, which grew into an invaluable work of 7 vols., entitled "Historical Collections"; acted as assistant-clerk to the Long Parliament; sat as a member in several Parliaments, and was for some years secretary to Fairfax and the Lord-Keeper; fell into disfavour after the Restoration, and in 1684 was arrested for debt and died in prison (1612-1690).

RUSKIN, JOHN, art-critic and social reformer, born in London, son of a wine merchant; educated at home under the eye of his parents, and particularly his mother, who trained him well into familiarity with the Bible, and did not object to his study of "Robinson Crusoe," along with the "Pilgrim's Progress" on Sundays, while, left to his own choice, he read Homer, Scott, and Byron on week days; entered Christ Church, Oxford, as a gentleman Commoner in 1837, gained the Newdigate Prize in 1839, produced in 1843, under the name of "A Graduate of Oxford," the first volume of "Modern Painters," mainly in defence of the painter Turner and his art, which soon extended to five considerable volumes, and in 1849 "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," in definition of the qualities of good art in that line, under the heads of the Lamps of Sacrifice, of Truth, of Power, of Beauty, of Life, of Memory, and of Obedience, pleading in particular for the Gothic style; these were followed in 1851 by "Pre-Raphaelitism" (q.v.), and in 1851-52 by the "Stones of Venice," in further exposition of his views in the "Seven Lamps," and others on the same and kindred arts. Not till 1862 did he appear in the rôle of social reformer, and that was by the publication of "Unto this Last," in the Cornhill Magazine, on the first principles of political economy, the doctrines in which were further expounded in "Munera Pulveris," "Time and Tide," and "Fors Clavigera" (q.v.), to the principles in which he endeavoured to give practical effect by the Institution of St. George's Guild, with the view of commending "the rational organisation of country life independent of that of cities." His writings are numerous, several of them originally lectures, besides many others which he began but had to leave unfinished from failing health, among these his "Preterita," or memories from his past life. The most popular of his writings is "Sesame and Lilies," with perhaps the "Crown of Wild Olive," and the most useful that of the series beginning with "Unto this Last," and culminating in "Time and Tide." He began his career as an admirer of Turner, and finished as a disciple of Thomas Carlyle, but neither slavishly nor with the surrender of his own sense of justice and truth; Justice was the goddess he worshipped, and except in her return to the earth as sovereign he boded nothing but disaster to the fortunes of the race (1819-1900).

RUSSELL, JOHN, EARL, known best as LORD JOHN RUSSELL, statesman, youngest son of the Earl of Bedford; travelled in Spain, studied at Edinburgh, entered Parliament in 1818, took up vigorously the cause of parliamentary reform and Catholic Emancipation, joined Earl Grey's ministry in 1830 as Paymaster of the Forces, framed and zealously advocated the Reform Bill (1832), drove Peel from office in 1835, and became, under Lord Melbourne, Home Secretary and leader of the Commons; four years later he was appointed Colonial Secretary, warmly espoused the cause of repeal of the Corn Laws, formed a ministry on the downfall of Peel in 1846, and dealt with Irish difficulties and Chartism; resigned in 1852, and in the same year became Foreign Secretary under Aberdeen; became unpopular on account of his management of the Crimean War (1855) and conduct at the Vienna Conference; again Foreign Secretary in Palmerston's ministry of 1859, an earl in 1861, and premier a second time in 1866-1866; author of various pamphlets, biographies, memoirs, &c.; was twice married; was nicknamed "Finality John" from his regarding his Reform Bill of 1832 as a final measure (1792-1878).

RUSSELL, WILLIAM, LORD, prominent politician in Charles II.'s reign, younger son of the Earl of Bedford; entered the first Restoration Parliament, became a prominent leader in the Country Party in opposition to the Cabal (q.v.), and the Popish schemes of the King; vigorously supported the Exclusion Bill to keep James, Duke of York, from the throne in 1683; was charged with complicity in the Rye-house Plot, was found guilty on trumped-up evidence, and beheaded (1689-1683).

RUSSELL, WILLIAM CLARK, a popular writer of nautical novels, born in New York; gained his experience of sea life during eight years' service as a sailor; was a journalist on the staff of the Daily Chronicle before, in 1887, he took to writing novels, which include "John Holdsworth" and "The Wreck of the Grosvenor" (1844-1911).

RUSSELL, SIR WILLIAM HOWARD, a celebrated war correspondent, born in Dublin; was educated at Trinity College and called to the English bar in 1850; had already acted for some years as war correspondent for the Times before his famous letters descriptive of the Crimean War won him a wide celebrity; subsequently acted as correspondent during the Indian Mutiny, American Civil War, Franco-German War, &c.; accompanied the Prince of Wales to India in 1875; knighted in 1895 (1820-1907).

RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, CHARLES RUSSELL, LORD, a distinguished lawyer, born in Newry; educated at Trinity College, Dublin, called to the English bar in 1859, entered Parliament in 1880, became Attorney-General in 1886, receiving also a knighthood; in 1894 was elevated to the Lord Chief Justiceship and created a life-peer (1833-1900).

RUSSIA, or the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, occupies most of the territory of the former Russian Empire except for the now independent States of Lithuania, Poland, Finland, Esthonia, and Latvia, and is composed of a federation of 50 Soviet republics, embracing one-sixth of the land-surface of the globe, including one-half of Europe, all Northern and a part of Central Asia; on the N. it fronts the Arctic Ocean; its southern limit forms an irregular line from the NW. corner of the Black Sea to the Sea of Japan, skirting Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, East Turkestan, and China. Behring Sea, Sea of Okhotsk, and the Sea of Japan wash its eastern shores; Sweden, the Baltic, and Poland lie contiguous to it in West Europe. This solid, compact mass is thinly peopled (13 to the sq. m. over all) by some 40 different-speaking races, including, besides the dominant Russians (themselves split into three branches), Poles, Finns, Esthonians, Serbians, Bulgarians, Lithuanians, Kurds, Persians, Turco-Tartars, Mongols, &c. Three-fourths of the land-surface, with one-fourth of the population, lies in Asia, and is treated under Siberia, Turkestan, Caucasasia, &c. Russia in Europe is divided from Asia by the Ural Mountains and River and Caspian Sea; forms an irregular, somewhat elongated, square plain sloping down to the low and dreary coastlands of the Baltic (W.), White Sea (N.), and Black Sea (S.); is seamed by river valleys and diversified by marshes, vast lakes (e.g. Ladoga, Onega, Peipus, and Ilmen), enormous forests, and in the N. and centre by tablelands, the highest of which are the Valdai Hills (1100 ft.); the SE. plain is called the Steppes (q.v.). The cold and warm winds which sweep uninterrupted from N. and S. produce extremes of temperature; the rainfall is small. Agriculture is the prevailing industry, engaging 90 per cent. of the people, although in all not more than 21 per cent. of the soil is cultivated; rye is the chief article of food for the peasantry, who comprise four-fifths of the population. The rich plains, known as the "black lands" from their deep, loamy soil, which stretch from the Carpathians to the Urals, are the most productive corn lands in Europe, and rival in fertility the "yellow lands" of China, and like them need no manure. Timber is an important industry in the NW., and maize and the vine are cultivated in the extreme S.; minerals abound, and include gold, iron (widely distributed), copper (chiefly in middle Urals), and platinum; there are several large coal-fields and rich petroleum wells at Baku. The fisheries, particularly those of the Caspian, are the most productive in Europe. Immense numbers of horses and cattle are reared, e.g. on the Steppes. Wolves, bears, and valuable fur-bearing animals are plentiful in the N. and other parts; the reindeer is still found, also the elk. Want of ports on the Mediterranean and Atlantic hampers commerce, while the great ports in the Baltic are frozen up four or five months in the year; the southern ports are growing in importance, and wheat, timber, flax, and wool are largely exported. There is a vast inland trade, facilitated by the great rivers (Volga, Don, Dnieper, Dniester, Vistula, &c.) and by excellent railway and telegraphic communication. Among its varied races there exists a wide variety of religions—Christianity, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Shamanism, &c.; but although some 130 sects exist, the bulk of the Russians proper belonged, prior to the Revolution, to the Greek Church. Education is backward, more than 85 per cent. of the people being illiterate; there are eight universities. Conscription is enforced; the army is the largest in the world. Government is in the hands of local soviets; the ultimate legislative and executive power is in the hands of a central committee and the Union Congress. The great builders of the empire, the beginnings of which are to be sought in the 9th century, have been Ivan the Great, who in the 15th century drove out the Mongols and established his capital in Moscow; Ivan the Terrible, the first of the czars, who in the 16th century rushed into Asia and down to the Black Sea; and Peter the Great (q.v.). The Great War gave the Bolsheviks an opportunity to indulge in propaganda among the troops, and after abortive attempts at revolution they succeeded in November, 1917, in gaining control of the country, after the first revolution, led by Kerensky, had curtailed the power of the Czar. Lenin and Trotsky became virtual dictators, and attempts at counter-revolutions subsequently all met with failure. Within recent years its literature has become popular in Europe through the powerful writings of Pushkin, Turgenev, and Tolstol.

RUSSIAN REVOLUTION, THE, really began with the defeat of Russia in the war with Japan, which led to a small revolt in 1906 and the summoning of a National Assembly. The Great War and the growing influence of Rasputin led to widespread demand for reform, and in April, 1917, Kerensky became Prime Minister and attempted constitutional government. In the autumn the Bolsheviks under Lenin and Trotsky captured the reins. They made peace with Germany, executed the Czar and his family, and forced communism on the country, which they maintained despite counter-revolutions.

RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR, THE, was started by Japan in 1904 on the failure of her demand that Russia should leave Korea and Manchuria. Russia suffered naval reverses in February off Port Arthur, and a military defeat at Nanchang in May. Despite strenuous efforts by Russia, Port Arthur fell in January, 1905, and after American mediation the war ended in September, Japan gaining most of her demands.

RUSTHUE, a town in Bulgaria, on the Danube, 40 m. S. by W. of Bucharest; manufactures gold and silver ware, shoes, cloth, &c.; has a number of interesting mosques; its once important fortifications were reduced in 1877.

RUTESBEUF, or RUSTEBEUF, a celebrated trouvère of the 13th century, of whom little is known save that he led a Bohemian life in Paris and was unfortunate in his marriage; his songs, satires, &c., are vigorous and full of colour, and touch a note of seriousness at times which one hardly anticipates.

RUTHENIANS, a hardy Slavonic people, a branch of the Little Russian stock, numbering close upon 8½ millions, dwelling in Galicia and Northern Hungary.

RUTHERFORD, SIR ERNEST, British physicist, born in New Zealand and educated at Cambridge. Professor of Physics at McGill University (Montreal) and Manchester, and in 1919 succeeded Sir J. J. Thomson as Cavendish professor at Cambridge; he did much to lay the foundations of the study of radioactivity and the conduction of electricity through gases; his greatest work has been in connection with the structure of the atom; carrying on the work of Thomson, he gave the experimental basis to modern theories of the atom; he brought forward the planetary theory of the atom, which has been amplified theoretically by Bohr and others (1871—).

RUTHERFORD, SAMUEL, a Scottish divine, born in Nisbet, near Jedburgh; studied at Edinburgh University, became professor of Humanity, but had to resign; studied divinity, and became minister of Anworth in 1627, and was a zealous pastor and a fervid preacher; corresponded far and wide with pious friends by letters, afterwards published under his name, and much esteemed by pious people; became at length professor of Divinity at St. Andrews, and represented the Scottish Church in the Westminster Assembly in 1643; wrote several works, for one of which he was called to account as he lay on his death-bed (1600–1661).

RUTHGLENN, a town of Lanarkshire, on the Clyde, 8 m. SE. of Glasgow, of which it is practically a suburb; a handsome bridge spans the river; has been a royal burgh since 1126, and has interesting historical associations.

RUTHIN, an interesting old town of Denbighshire, on the Clwyd, 8 m. SE. of Denbigh, with mineral water manufacture.

RUTHVEN, RAID OF, a conspiracy entered into by certain Scottish nobles, headed by William, first Earl of Gowrie, to seize the young king James VI., and break down the influence of his worthless favourites, Lennox and Arran; at Ruthven Castle, or Huntingtower, in Perthshire, on August 23, 1582, the king was captured and held for 10 months; Arran was imprisoned, and Lennox fled to die in France; the conduct of the conspirators was applauded by the country, but after the escape of the king from St. Andrews Castle the conspirators were proclaimed guilty of treason, and Gowrie was executed in 1584.

RUTHWELL CROSS, a remarkable sandstone cross, 17½ ft. high, found in Ruthwell parish, 9 m. SE. of Dumfries, dates back to the 7th century; bears runic and Latin inscriptions notably some verses of the Saxon poem, "The Dream of the Holy Rood"; was broken down in 1642 by the Covenanters as savouring of idolatry; found and re-erected in 1802.

RUTLAND, the smallest county of England, bounded by Lincoln, Northampton, and Leicestershire; has a pleasant undulating surface, with valleys in the E., and extensive woods; is watered by the Welland; is largely pastoral, and raises fine sheep; dairy produce (especially cheese) and wheat are noted; Oakham is the capital.

RUYSDAEL, JACOB, a famous Dutch landscape painter, born and died in Haarlem; few particulars of his life are known; his best pictures, to be seen in the galleries of Dresden, Berlin, and Paris, display a fine poetic spirit (1628–1682).

RUYSER, MICHAEL ADRIANZON DE, a famous Dutch admiral, born of poor parents in Flushing; from a boy of 11 served in the merchant and naval service; commanded a ship under Van Tromp in the war with England, 1652–1654; was employed in 1660 by the king of Denmark for services rendered in the Dano-Swedish war; for two years fought against Turkish pirates in the Mediterranean; commanded the Dutch fleet in the second war against England, and in 1667 struck terror into London by raiding and burning the shipping in the Thames; held his own against England and France in the war of 1672; co-operated with Spain against France; was routed and mortally wounded off the coast of Sicily (1607–1675).

RYAN, LOCH, an arm of the sea penetrating Wigtownshire in a south-easterly direction, 8 m. long and from 1½ to 3 broad; at its landward end is Stranraer (q.v.); forms an excellent anchorage.

RYBINSK, a busy commercial town in Russia, on the Volga, 48 m. NW. of Yaroslavl; connected by canal with Leningrad; industries embrace boat-building, brewing, and distilling.

RYDE, a popular old watering-place on the NE. coast of the Isle of Wight, 4½ m. SW. of Portsmouth; rises in pretty wooded terraces from the sea; has a fine promenade, park, and pier, and is well known for its annual regatta.

RYDER CUP, a trophy presented by Samuel Ryder of America in 1927 for annual competition between teams of professional golfers representing Great Britain and the U.S.A.

RYE, an interesting old port in the SE. corner of Sussex, situated on rising ground flanked by two streams, 63 m. SE. from London; is one of the Cinque Ports (q.v.); the recession of the sea has left it now 2 m. inland; has a fine Norman and Early English church.

RYE HOUSE PLOT, an abortive conspiracy in 1683 to assassinate Charles II. of England and his brother James, Duke of York, planned by Colonel Rumsey, Lieutenant-Colonel Walcot, the "plotter" Ferguson, and other reckless adherents of the Whig party. The conspirators were to conceal themselves at a farmhouse called Rye House, near Hertford, and to waylay the royal party returning from Newmarket; the plot miscarried owing to the king leaving Newmarket sooner than was expected; the chief conspirators were executed.

RYKOFF, ALEXEI IVANOVITCH, Russian politician. Born of good peasant stock in Saratov, he studied at Kazan University, from where he was expelled for revolutionary propaganda. In the succeeding years he was constantly arrested and imprisoned, and for a time exiled. After the 1917 revolution he was elected to the Central Committee of the Bolshevik party and became chairman of the Moscow Soviet. In 1918 he was made chairman of the Supreme Economic Council, and in 1924 succeeded Lenin as President of the Council of People's Commissars, the highest post in Soviet Russia (1881-).

RYMER, THOMAS, the learned editor of the "Foedera," an invaluable collection of historical documents dealing with England's relations with foreign powers, born in Northallerton; was a Cambridge man and a barrister; turned to literature and wrote much both in prose and poetry, but to no great purpose; was Historiographer-royal; Macaulay in characteristic fashion calls him "the worst critic that ever lived"; but his "Foedera" is an enduring monument to his unwearied industry (1641-1718).

RYSBRAECH, JOHN MICHAEL, a well-known sculptor in the 18th century, born in Antwerp; established himself in London and executed busts and statues of the most prominent men of his day, including the monument to Sir Isaac Newton in Westminster Abbey, statue of Marlborough, busts of Walpole, Bolingbroke, and Pope (1694-1770).

RYSWICK, PEACE OF, signed in September, 1697, at the village of Ryswick, 2 m. S. of The Hague, by England, Holland, Germany, and Spain on the one hand and France on the other, terminating the sanguinary struggle which had begun in 1688.

SAADI

SAADI. See SADI.

SAALE, the name of several German rivers, the most important of which rises in the Fichtelgebirge, near Zell, in Upper Bavaria; flows northward, a course of 226 m., till it joins the Elbe at Harz; has numerous towns on its banks, including Jena, Halle, and Naumburg, to which last it is navigable.

SAAR TERRITORY, an area of land adjacent to Lorraine, prior to the Great War part of Prussia and her greatest source of coal supply; under the Treaty of Versailles it was handed over to the administration of a commission of the League of Nations, with a stipulation that the inhabitants should determine their nationality after 15 years by the taking of a plebiscite.

SAARBRUCK, a manufacturing town in Rhensish Prussia, on the French frontier, where the French under Napoleon III. repulsed the Germans, August 2, 1870.

SABADELL, a prosperous Spanish town, 14 m. NW. of Barcelona; manufactures cotton and woollen textiles.

SABEANS, a trading people who before the days of Solomon and for long after inhabited South Arabia, on the shores of the Red Sea, and who worshipped the sun and moon with other kindred deities; also a religious sect on the Lower Euphrates, with Jewish, Moslem, and Christian rites as well as pagan, called Christians of St. John; the term Sabeanism, or Sabianism, designates the worship of the former.

SABAOTH, name given in the Bible, and particularly in the Epistle of James, to the Divine Being as the Lord of all hosts or kinds of creatures.

SABATHAI ZEVI, a Jewish impostor, who gave himself out to be the Messiah, and persuaded a number of Jews to forsake all and follow him; the sultan of Turkey forced him to confess the imposture, and he turned Mussulman to save his life (1626-1676).

SABBATH, the seventh day of the week, observed by the Jews as a day of "rest" from all work and "holy to the Lord," as His day, specially in commemoration of His rest from the work of creation, the observance of which, however, by the Christian Church has been transferred to the first of the week in commemoration of Christ's resurrection.

SABELLIANISM, the doctrine of one Sabellius, who, in the third century, denied that there were three persons in the Godhead, and maintained that there was only one person in three functions, aspects, or manifestations; whatever was his precise disputation this was the form his doctrine assumed in course of time, it being known by his name, and accepted by many up to the present day.

SABIANISM. See SABEANS.

SABINE, a river of Texas which, rising in the extreme N. of the State, flows SE. and S., forming for 250 m. the boundary between Louisiana and Texas; passes through Sabine Lake into the Gulf of Mexico after a navigable course of 500 m.

SABINE, SIR EDWARD, a noted physicist, born in Dublin; served in artillery in 1803, maintained his connection with it till his retirement in 1874 as general, but owes his celebrity to his important investigations into the nature of terrestrial magnetism; accompanied as a scientist Ross and Parry in their search for the North-West Passage (1819-1820); was President of the Royal Society from 1861 to 1879 and of the British Association in 1852 at Belfast (1788-1881).

SABINES, an ancient Italian people of the Aryan stock, near neighbours of Rome, a colony of whom is said to have settled on the Quirinal and contributed to form the moral part of the Roman people. Numa, the second king of the city, was a Sabine. See ROMULUS.

SABLE ISLAND, a low, sandy, barren island in the Atlantic, 110 m. off the E. coast of Nova Scotia; is extremely dangerous to navigation, and is marked by three lighthouses; is gradually being washed away.

SABOTS, a species of wooden shoes extensively worn by the peasants of France, Belgium, &c.; each shoe is hewn out of a single block of wood (fir, willow, beech, and ash); well adapted for marshy districts.

SACCHARIN, a synthetic sweetening substance obtained from toluene, one of the coal-tar products; used as a substitute for sugar.

SACCO AND VANZETTI, two Italian-American communists who were executed in 1927 for a murder committed in Massachusetts in 1921. They were arrested at a time when there was a stern campaign waged against alien revolutionaries, and their case became a political question, as it was argued their opinions were used against them. Legal delays postponed the execution for six years, and when it eventually took place there were demonstrations and riots in every capital of Europe as well as in America.

SACERDOTALISM, a tendency to attach undue importance to the order and the ministry of priests, to the limitation of the operation of Divine grace.

SACHEVEREL, HENRY, an English Church clergyman, born in Marlborough, who became notorious in the reign of Queen Anne for his embittered attack (contained in two sermons in 1709) on the Revolution Settlement and the Act of Toleration; public feeling was turning in favour of the Tories, and the impolitic impeachment of Sacheverel by the Whig Government fanned popular feeling to a great height in his favour; he was suspended from preaching for three years, at the expiry of which time the Tories, then in power, received him with ostentatious marks of favour; was an Oxford graduate, and a friend of Addison, but a man of no great ability (1672-1734).

SACHS, HANS, a noted early German poet, born in Nurnberg; the son of a tailor, by trade a shoemaker; learned "the mystery of song" from a weaver; was a contemporary of Luther, who acknowledged his services in the cause of the Reformation; in his seventy-fourth year (1568), on examining his stock for publication, found that he had written 6048 poetical pieces, among them 208 tragedies and comedies, while at the same time pursuing his trade; wrote "Narrenschneiden," a piece in which the doctor cures a bloated and lethargic patient by "cutting out half-a-dozen fools from his interior"; he sank into oblivion during the 17th century, but his memory was revived by Goethe in the 18th (1494-1576).

SACHS, JULIUS VON, a German botanist and professor, born in Breslau; wrote several works on botany, and experimented on the physiology of plants (1832-1897).

SACKVILLE, THOMAS, EARL OF DORSET, poet and statesman, born in Buckhurst; bred for the bar; entered Parliament in 1558; wrote with Thomas Norton a tragedy called "Gorboduc," and contributed to a collection of British legends called the "Mirror of Magistrates" two pieces in noble verse (1536-1608).

SACRAMENT, a ceremonial observance in the Christian Church divinely instituted as either really or symbolically a means, and in any case a pledge, of grace. SACRAMENTARIAN, a High Churchman who attaches a special sacred virtue to the sacraments of the Church.

SACRAMENTO, largest river of California, rises in the NE. in the Sierra Nevada; follows a south-westerly course, draining the central valley of California; falls into San Francisco Bay, on the Pacific coast, after a course of 500 miles, of which 250 are navigable.

SACRAMENTO, capital of California, situated at the confluence of the Sacramento and American Rivers, 90 m. NE. of San Francisco; industries embrace flour and planing mills, foundries, and potteries; has an art gallery, court-house, and many fine buildings; the tropical climate is tempered at night by cool sea breezes.

SACRED WARS. See AMPHICTYONIC COUNCIL.

SACY, ANTOINE ISAAC, BARON SILVESTRE DE, the greatest of modern Orientalists, born in Paris; by twenty-three was a master of classic, Oriental, and modern European languages; was appointed in 1795 professor of Arabic in the School of Oriental Languages, and in 1808 of Persian in the Collège de France, besides which he held various other appointments; founded the Asiatic Society in 1822; was created a baron by Napoleon Bonaparte, and entered the Chamber of Peers in 1832; published "Biographies of Persian Poets," a standard Arabic grammar, and "Memoirs of Oriental History and Literature"; his writings gave a stimulus to Oriental research throughout Europe (1768-1838).

SADDA, the name given to a Persian epitome of the Zend-Avesta.

SADDUCEES, a sect of the Jews of high priestly origin that first came into prominence by their opposition to the Pharisees, being the party in power when Pharisaism arose in protestation against their policy as tending to the secularization of the Jewish faith, or the prostitution of it to mere secular ends. They represented the Tory or Conservative party among the Jews, as the Pharisees did the High Church party. The antagonism which thus arose on political grounds gradually extended to religious matters. In regard to religion they were the old orthodox party, and acknowledged the obligation only of the written law, and refused to accept tradition at the hands of the Scribes. They denied the immortality of the soul, the separate existence of spirits, and this they did on strictly Old Testament grounds, but not from any real respect for the authority of Scripture, only as in accord with the main article of their creed, which attached importance only to what bore upon this present life, their doctrine approximating to secularism. They were at bottom a purely political party, and they disappeared from Jewish history with the fall of the Jewish State, only the Pharisaic party surviving in witness of what Judaism is.

SADE, DONATIE ALPHONSE FRANÇOIS, MARQUIS DE, French novelist, who, after fighting in the Seven Years' War, was sentenced to death for odious crimes, effected his escape, but was caught and imprisoned in the Bastille, where he wrote a number of licentious romances; died a lunatic; the term "sadeism" is derived from his name (1740-1814).

SADI, a celebrated Persian poet, born in Shiraz, of noble lineage, but born poor; bred up in the Moslem faith; made pilgrimages to Mecca no fewer than 15 times; spent years in travel; fell into the hands of the Crusaders; was ransomed by a merchant of Aleppo, who thought him worth ransoming at a cost; retired to a hermitage near Shiraz, where he died and was buried; his works, both in prose and verse, are numerous, but the most celebrated is the "Gulistan" (the rose-garden), a collection of moral tales interlarded with philosophical reflections and maxims of wisdom, which have made his name famous all over both the East and the West (1184-1291).

SADLER, SIR RALPH, a politician and diplomatist; was employed by Henry VIII. in carrying out the dissolution of the monasteries, and conducted diplomatic negotiations with Scotland; distinguished himself at the battle of Pinkie; enjoyed the favour of Elizabeth; was Queen Mary's keeper in the Castle of Tutbury; was the bearer of the news of Queen Mary's execution to King James (1507-1587).

SADOLETO, JACOPO, cardinal, born in Modena; acted as secretary under Leo X., Clement VII., and Paul III., the last of whom created him a cardinal in 1586; was a faithful Churchman and an accomplished scholar (1477-1547).

SADOWA. See KÖNIGGRÄTZ.

SAFED, a town of Palestine, 12 m. N. of Tiberias, occupied principally by Jews attracted thither in part by the expectation that the Messiah, when He appears, will establish His kingdom there; it spreads in horse-shoe fashion round the foot of a hill 2700 ft. high; is a seat of Hebrew learning.

SAFEGUARDING, the policy of imposing an import duty on articles manufactured in countries where owing to low wages or advantage of the exchange the cost of production is lower than here, and with which our manufacturers are unable to compete. The Safeguarding of Industries Act was passed in 1915, and under it any industry can apply for protection and state its case before a standing committee of the Board of Trade. In 1915 the McKenna duties safeguarded the motor industry and musical instruments.

SAFETY LAMP, name of a variety of lamps for safety in coal-mines against "fire-damp," a highly explosive mixture of natural gas apt to accumulate in them; the best-known being the "Davy Lamp," invented by Sir Humphry Davy, and the "Geordie," invented by George Stephenson, both of which, however, have been superseded by the Gray, Mueseler, Marsant, and other lamps; all are constructed on the principle discovered by Davy and Stephenson, that a flame enveloped in wire gauze of a certain fineness does not ignite "fire-damp," owing to the wire being a good conductor of heat.

SAFI, or ASFI, a decayed seaport of Morocco, on the Mediterranean coast, 120 m. N.W. of the city of Morocco; has ruins of a castle of the Sultans and of the old Portuguese fortifications; has still a fair export trade in beans, wool, olive-oil, almonds, and gum.

SAGAR, a low island at the mouth of the Hugli, a sacred spot and a place of pilgrimage to the Hindus; mostly jungle; sparsely peopled.

SAGAS, a collection of epics in prose embodying the myths and legends of the ancient Scandinavians, originally transmitted from mouth to mouth, and assuming a literary form about the 12th century.

SAGASTA, FRAKEDIS MATEO, Spanish statesman of liberal sympathies; took part in the insurrections of 1868 and 1869, and was for some time fugitive in France; entered General Prim's Cabinet, supported the elected King Amadeus, and after his abdication led the Liberal party; twice Prime Minister (1827-1903).

SAGHALIEN, a long narrow island belonging to Russia, situated close to the E. coast of Siberia, from which it is separated by the so-called Gulf of Tartary; stretches N. from the island of Yeso, a distance of 670 m.; is mountainous and forest-clad in the interior; has excellent coast fisheries, but a cold, damp climate prevents successful agriculture; rich coal-mines exist, and are wrought by thousands of convicts. Ceded by Japan to Russia in 1875.

SAGITTARIUS, the ninth sign of the zodiac, which the sun enters on November 20.

SAGUENAY, a large and picturesque river of Canada; carries off the surplus waters of Lake St. John, replenished by a number of large streams, and, issuing a full-bodied stream, flows S.E. through magnificent forest and mountain scenery till it falls into the St. Lawrence, 115 m. below Quebec, after a course of 100 m.; is remarkable for its depth, and is navigable by large ships.

SAGURTO, a town of ancient Spain, was situated where now stands the town of Murviedro, 18 m. N.E. of Valencia; famous in history for its memorable siege by Hannibal in 219 B.C., which led to the Second Punic War.

SAHARA, the largest desert region in the world, stretches E. and W. across Northern Africa, from the Atlantic to the valley of the Nile, a distance of 3000 m.; on the N. is limited by the slopes of the Atlas Mountains, and on the S. by the valleys of the Senegal and Niger Rivers. The surface is diversified by long sweeps of undulating sand-dunes, elevated plateaux, hill and mountain ranges (8000 ft. highest), furrowed by dried-up water-courses and dotted with fertile oases, which yield date-palms, oranges, lemons, figs, &c. The most sterile tract is in the W., stretching in a semi-circle between Cape Blanco and Fezzan. Rain falls over the greater part at intervals of from two to five years. Temperature will vary from over 100° F. to below freezing-point in 24 hours. There are a number of definite caravan routes connecting Timbuctoo and the Central Soudan with the Niger and coastlands. Dates and salt are the chief products; the giraffe, wild ass, lion, ostrich, and pythons are found there. It is chiefly inhabited by nomadic and often warlike Moors, Arabs, Berbers, and various negro races. The greater part is within the sphere of French influence.

SAHARANPUR, a town in the North-West Provinces of India, 125 m. N. of Delhi, in a district formerly malarial, but now drained and healthy; the population principally Mohammedans, who have built in it a handsome mosque.

SAHIB (i.e. master), used in India when addressing a European gentleman, and corresponding to "Sir"; Mem sahib is the form of address to a lady.

SALT RANGE, a tract of lofty tableland buttressed on either side by mountain ranges 3000 to 5000 ft. high, and stretching across the Punjab E. and W., between Jhelum and Indus Rivers; derives its name from the remarkably rich deposits of rock-salt, which are extensively worked.

SALTS, in chemistry an important class of compound substances formed by the union of an acid with a metal or a base, that is, a substance having, like a metal, the power of replacing in part or in whole the hydrogen of the acid employed.

SALVADOR, the smallest but the most densely populated of the republics of Central America, about one-sixth the size of England and Wales; has a western foreshore between Guatemala (N.) and Nicaragua (S.), fronting the Pacific for 40 m.; slopes up from rich alluvial coast-lands to high plateaux, which stretch, seamed and broken by rivers and volcanoes, to the Cordillera frontier of Honduras on the E.; soil is extremely fertile and naturally irrigated by numerous streams, and produces in abundance coffee and indigo (chief exports), balsam, tobacco, sugar, and cereals; has a warm, healthy climate. The natives are chiefly Indians of Aztec descent, but speaking Spanish. The government is vested in a president and chamber of deputies. Education is free and compulsory. It broke away from Spanish control in 1821; was a member of the Central American Confederacy, but since 1853 has enjoyed complete independence. Capital, San Salvador (q.v.).

SALVARSAN, a synthetic drug containing arsenic, used in the treatment of malaria, sleeping sickness, and other diseases.

SALVATION ARMY, a modern religious organization and propaganda, remarkable alike for its novel methods and phenomenal expansion; assumed its present quasi-military form in 1878, but is in reality the outgrowth of a mission founded in London in 1865 by the Rev. William Booth (q.v.), and nobly furthered by his wife. It is in essence a protest against the older conventional methods of propagating the Christian religion, and would seem by its remarkable success to have ministered to some latent and widespread need among the poorer classes. It now has branches all over the world. The members assume semi-military attire, march to the sound of musical instruments, display banners; but while these and other sensational devices bring its purposes home to the hearts of the people, its vitality rests upon the real spiritual devotion and self-sacrifice of its members. Various agencies of a more directly philanthropic kind (homes of rest, rescue brigades, workshops, farms, &c.) have become attached to it, and are generously supported by the public. Funds are raised by means of the War Cry and other periodicals.

SALVINI, TOMMASO, a celebrated Italian tragedian, born, the son of an actor, in Milan; was trained to the stage, and joined Ristori's company; served with distinction in the revolutionary war of 1849, and, returning to the stage, won for himself a European fame, appearing in France, Spain, United States, England, and other countries; achieved his greatest success in "Othello"; retired after 1884, and published "Leaves from My Autobiography" (1829-1915).

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH ERNST DANIEL, great German theologian, born in Breslau; brought up among the Moravians, his mind revolted against the narrow orthodoxy of their creed, which was confirmed by his study of Plato and the philosophy of the school of Kant, as it for him culminated in Schelling, though the religious feeling he inherited never left him; under these influences he addressed himself to the task of elaborating a theology in which justice should be done to the claims of the intellect and the emotions of the heart, and began by translating Plato; soon he formed a school, which included among its members men such as Neander, distinguished at once for their learning and their piety, and to which all the schools of theology in Germany since have been more or less indebted; his great merit lay in the importance he attached to the religious consciousness as derived from that of Christ, and the development therefrom in the life and history of the Church of Christ (1768-1834).

SCHLEMIHL, PETER, the name of a man who in Chamisso's tale sold his shadow to the devil, a synonym for one who makes a desperate or silly bargain.

SCHLEMMANN, HEINRICH, a German explorer, born in Mecklenburg-Schwerin; excavated at his own cost the ruins, among others in Greece, of Hissarlik, in the Troad, believing them to be those of Troy; spent 12 years in this enterprise, collecting the spoils and depositing them in safe keeping in Berlin; died at Naples before his excavations were complete (1822-1890).

SCHLOSSER, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH, German historian, born in Oldenburg; was studious of the moral factor in history, and gave especial prominence to it (1776-1861).

SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE, a league of the Protestant States of Germany concluded in 1531 at Schmalkalden, Prussia, in defence of their religious and civil liberties against the Emperor Charles V. and the Catholic States.

SCHNEIDER CUP, an international trophy for aviation, valued at £1000, and presented in 1913 by Jacques Schneider, a French patron of aviation. Seaplanes of any nationality may compete. France won the first contest at Monaco in 1913 at a speed of 45 miles an hour; the following year Britain won at 86 miles an hour; there were no contests during the Great War, but they were resumed in 1919. America and Italy both proving successful, as well as Britain. After 1927 the race was held every two years, and speeds of over 300 miles an hour have been achieved.

SCHNITZER, EDUARD, physician, born in Breslau; went to Turkey, entered the Turkish medical service, adopted the name Emin Pasha, and was appointed by Gordon medical officer of the Equatorial Province of Egypt, and raised to the rank of Pasha; soon after the outbreak of the Mahdist insurrection he was cut off from civilisation, but was discovered by Stanley in 1889 and brought to Zanzibar, after which he was murdered by Arabs (1840-1893).

SCHOLASTICISM, the name given to the philosophy that prevailed in Europe during the Middle Ages, particularly in the second half of them, and that has been generally characterised as an attempt at conciliation between dogma and thought, between faith and reason, an attempt to found a scientific system on that basis, founded on the pre-supposition that the creed of the Church was absolutely true and capable of rationalisation.

SCHOLIASTS, name given to a class of grammarians who appended annotations to the margins of the MSS. of the classics.

SCHOLIUM, a marginal note explanatory of the text of a classic author.

SCHOLTEN, JAN HENDRIK, a Dutch theologian of the rationalistic school, professor at Leyden (1811-1885).

SCHOMBERG, DUKE OF, French marshal, of German origin and the Protestant persuasion, took service under the Prince of Orange, and fell at the battle of the Boyne (1615-1690).

SCHOOLCRAFT, HENRY ROWE, a noted American ethnologist, born in New York State; at 24 was geologist on an exploring expedition undertaken by General Cass to Lake Superior and the Upper Mississippi; married the educated daughter of an Ojibway chief; founded the Historical Society of Michigan and the Algic Society at Detroit; discovered the sources of the Mississippi in 1832; was an active and friendly agent for the Indians, and in 1847 began, under Government authorisation, his great work of gathering together all possible information regarding the Indian tribes of the United States, an invaluable work embodied in six great volumes; author also of many other works treating of Indian life, exploration, &c. (1793-1864).

SCHOLIMEN, teachers of the scholastic philosophy (q.v.).

SCHOPENHAUER, ARTHUR, a bold metaphysical thinker, born in Danzig, of Dutch descent; was early dissatisfied with life, and conceived pessimistic views of it; in 1814 jotted down in a note-book, "Inward discord is the very bane of human nature so long as a man lives," and on this fact he brooded for years; at length the problem solved itself, and the solution appears in his great work, "Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung" ("The World as Will and Idea"), which he published in 1718; in it, as in others of his writings, to use the words of the late Professor Wallace of Oxford, Schopenhauer "draws close to the great heart of life, and tries to see clearly what man's existence, hopes and destiny really are"; his philosophy "recognises the peaceful creations of art as the most adequate representation the sense-world can give of the treacherous being of all things, and holds the best life to be that of one who has pierced, through the illusions dividing one conscious individuality from another, into that great heart of eternal rest where we are each members one of another, essentially united in the great ocean of Being, in which, and by which, we alone live"; his philosophy is a protest against treating it as a science instead of an art which has to do not merely with the reasoning powers, but with the whole innermost nature of man (1788-1860).

SCHOUBALOFF, COUNT PETER, a Russian ambassador, born in St. Petersburg; became in 1866 head of the secret police; came to England in 1873 on a secret mission to arrange the marriage of the Empress Alexander II.'s daughter with the Duke of Edinburgh; was one of Russia's representatives at the Congress of Berlin (1877-1879). His brother, Count Paul, fought in the Crimean War, helped to liberate the Russian serfs, fought in the Russo-Turkish War, and was governor of Warsaw during 1895-1897.

SCHREINER, OLIVE, authoress, daughter of a Lutheran clergyman at Cape Town; achieved a great success by "The Story of an African Farm" in 1883, which was followed in 1890 by "Dreams," also later "Dream Life and Real Life," and "Trooper Peter Halket," &c. (1859-1920).

SCHREINER, RIGHT HON. W. P., Premier of the Cape Parliament, brother of preceding; bred to the bar, favoured arbitration in the South African difficulty, and was a supporter of the Afrikaner Bond in politics (1857-1919).

SCHUBERT, FRANZ PETER, composer, born, the son of a Moravian schoolmaster, in Vienna; at 11 was one of the leading choristers in the court-chapel, later on became leading violinist in the school band; his talent for composition in all modes soon revealed itself, and by the time he became an assistant in his father's school (1813) his supreme gift of lyric melody showed itself in the song "Erl King," the "Mass in F," &c.; his too brief life, spent chiefly in the drudgery of teaching, was harassed by pecuniary embarrassment, embittered by the slow recognition his work won, though he was cheered by the friendly encouragement of Beethoven; his output of work was remarkable for its variety and quantity, embracing some 500 songs, 10 symphonies, 6 masses, operas, sonatas, &c.; his abiding fame rests on his songs, which are infused, as none other are, by an intensity of poetic feeling (1797-1828).

SCHULZE-DELITZSCH, HERMANN, founder of the system of "people's savings-banks"; born in Delitzsch, and trained to the law, he settled in his native town and gave himself to social reform, sat in the National Assembly in Berlin on the Progressivist side, but opposed Lassalle's socialistic programme; his project of "people's savings-banks" and other co-operative societies was started in 1850, and immediately took root, spreading over the country and into Austria, Italy, Belgium, &c. (1808-1883).

SCHUMANN, ROBERT, an eminent German composer and musical critic, born in Zwickau, in Saxony; law, philosophy, and travel occupied his early youth, but in 1831 he was allowed to follow his bent for music, and settled to study it at Leipzig; two years later started a musical paper, which for more than 10 years was the vehicle of essays in musical criticism; during these years appeared also his greatest pianoforte works, songs, symphonies, and varied chamber music; "Paradise and the Peri" and scenes from "Faust" appeared in 1843; symptoms of cerebral disease, which in the end proved fatal, began to manifest themselves, and he withdrew to a quieter life at Dresden, where much of his operatic and other music was written; during 1850-1854 he acted as musical director at Düsseldorf, but insanity at length supervened, and after attempting suicide in the Rhine he was placed in an asylum, where he died two years later; his work is full of the fresh colour and variety of Romanticism, his songs being especially beautiful (1810-1856).

SCHÜRER, EMIL, Biblical scholar, born in Augsburg, professor of Theology at Kiel, author of "History of the Jewish People" (1844-1910).

The capital, same name, is prettily situated 26 m. E. of Lucerne.

SCIENCE, in its broadest sense "systematized knowledge," though the word is frequently restricted to knowledge of natural phenomena; the modern sciences have developed from the early unscientific experimenters who obtained a great deal of unsystematic knowledge and reached a certain degree of skill by empirical methods, but failed to correlate those facts, e.g. chemistry grew out of alchemy and astronomy out of astrology; the aim of any particular science is to collect data concerning the phenomena within its province, correlate them, and to explain them as far as possible; the bases of all sciences are experimental or observed facts, and any scientific hypothesis is judged by the criterion of its agreement with the facts.

SCILLY ISLANDS, a rugged group of islands belonging to Cornwall, 27 m. S.W. of Land's End; consists of six larger islands—St. Mary's (1628 acres), the largest—and some 30 smaller, besides numerous rock clusters, the name Scilly being strictly applicable to a rocky islet in the N.W. of the group; climate is damp and mild; the cultivation and export of large quantities of lilies is the principal industry; light-houses have reduced greatly the hereditary occupation of pilotage, and emigration goes on; the chief towns are Hugh Town, on St. Mary's, Treason, and Samson, there are some interesting ecclesiastical ruins, &c.; since 1834 much has been done to improve the condition of the islanders.

SCIOPIUS CASPAR, a Protestant renegade, born in the Palatinate; turned Catholic on a visit to Rome, and devoted his life to vilify his former co-religionists, and to invoke the Catholic powers to combine to their extermination; he was a man of learning, but of most infirm temper (1576-1649).

SCIPIO, PUBLIUS CORNELIUS, THE ELDER, surnamed Africanus Major, a celebrated Roman general; was present at the engagement near the Tacinus and at Cannæ; was appointed proconsul of Spain at the age of 24, and made himself master of nearly the whole of it against the Carthaginians; on his return to Rome was made consul; transferred the seat of war against Carthage to Africa, and landed at Utica; met Hannibal on the field of Zama, totally defeated him, and ended the Second Punic War in 202 B.C. (234-183 B.C.).

SCIPIO, PUBLIUS CORNELIUS, THE YOUNGER, surnamed Africanus Minor, adopted by the Scipio family, his proper name being Lucius Paulus Aemilius; after distinguishing himself in Spain proceeded to Africa to take part in the Third Punic War; laid siege to Carthage, took it by storm, and levelled it with the ground in 146 B.C.; he was afterwards sent to Spain, where he captured Numantia after a stubborn resistance. In the extension of the sway of Rome, he was an upright and magnanimous man, but his character was not proof against assault; he died by the hand of an assassin (crr. 185-129 B.C.).

SCONE, a village in Perthshire, on the left bank of the Tay, 2 m. N. of Perth; once the capital of the Pictish kingdom, and the place of the coronation of the Scottish kings; near it is the seat of the Earl of Mansfield.

SCORY, JOHN, a Cambridge Dominican friar in 1530, who became bishop of Rochester in 1551, and later of Chichester; was deprived of his living on Queen Mary's accession; recanted, but fled abroad, whence he issued his "Epiatle to the Faithfull in Fryson in England," returned in Elizabeth's reign, and became bishop of Hereford; d. 1585.

SCOT, REGINALD, author of a famous work, "The Discoverie of Witchcraft" (1584), remarkable as one of the earliest exposures of the absurdities of witchcraft and kindred superstitions, which provoked King James's foolish defence "Demonology," son of a Kentish baronet; educated at Oxford, and spent a peaceful life gardening and studying; wrote also "The Hoppe Garden" (1638-1699).

SCOTLAND, the northern portion of the island of Great Britain, separated from England by the Solway, Cheviots, and Tweed, and bounded N. and W. by the Atlantic and E. by the North Sea; inclusive of 788 islands (600 uninhabited), its area, divided into 33 counties, is slightly more than one-half of England's, but it has a coastline longer by 700 m.; greatest length from Dunnet Head (most northerly point) to Mull of Galloway (most southerly) is 288 m., while the breadth varies from 32 to 175. Buchan Ness being the most easterly point and Ardnarmurchan Point the most westerly; from rich pastoral uplands in the N.—Cheviots, Moffat Hills, Lowthers, Moorfoots, and Launermours—the country slopes down to the wide, fertile lowland plain—growing fine crops of oats, barley, wheat, &c.—which stretches, with a varying breadth of from 30 to 60 m., up to the Grampians (highest peak Ben Nevis, 4406 ft.), whence the country sweeps northwards, a wild and beautiful tract of mountain, valley, and moorland, diversified by some of the finest lochs and river scenery in the world; the east and west coasts present remarkable contrasts, the latter rugged, irregular, and often precipitous, penetrated by long sea-lochs and fringed with numerous islands, and mild and humid in climate; the former low and regular, with few islands or inlets, and cold, dry, and bracing; of rivers the Tweed, Forth, Tay, Dee, and Clyde are the principal, and the Orkneys, Shetlands, and Hebrides the chief island groups; coal and iron abound in the lowlands, more especially in the plain of the Forth and Clyde, and granite in the Grampians; staple industries are the manufacture of cottons, woollens, linen, jute, machinery, hardware, paper, and shipbuilding, of which Glasgow is the centre and commercial metropolis, while Edinburgh (capital) is the chief seat of law, education, &c.; of cultivated land the percentage varies from 74·8 in Fife to 2·4 in Sutherland, and over all is only 24·2; good roads, canals, extensive railway and telegraph systems knit all parts of the country together; Presbyterianism is the established form of religion, and in 1872 the old parish schools were supplanted by a national system under school-boards similar to England; the Lowlanders and Highlanders still retain distinctive characteristics of their Teutonic and Celtic progenitors, the latter speaking in many parts of the Highlands their native Gaelic; originally the home of the Picts (q.v.), and by them called Alban or Albyn, the country, already occupied as far as the Forth and Clyde by the Romans, was in the 5th century successfully invaded by the Scots, a Celtic tribe from Ireland; in 843 their king Kenneth was crowned king of Picts and Scots, and by the 10th century the country (known to the Romans as Caledonia) began to be called Scotia or Scotland; government and power gradually centred in the richer lowlands, which, through contact with England, and from the number of English immigrants, became distinctively Anglo-Saxon; since the Union with England (q.v.) the prosperity of Scotland has been of steady and rapid growth, manufactures, commerce, and literature (in all branches) having flourished wonderfully.

SCOTLAND YARD, NEW, the headquarters of the Metropolitan police and the crime investigation organization of the country.

SCOTS, THE, a tribe of Celts from Ireland who settled in the W. of North Britain, and who, having gained the ascendancy of the Picts in the E., gave to the whole country the name of Scotland.

SCOTT, DAVID, Scottish painter, born in Edinburgh; he was an artist of great imaginative power, and excelled in the weird, his first big picture, exhibited in 1824, was "The Hopes of Early Genius Dispelled by Death," though his earliest achievements were his illustrations of the "Ancient Mariner," but his masterpiece is "Vasco da Gama encountering the Spirit of the Cape"; he was a sensitive man, and disappointment hastened his death (1806-1890).

SCOTT, DUKINFIELD HENRY, British scientist, professor of botany at University College, London, and the Imperial College of Science; son of the following; published several books on plant life and carried out research on fossil plants (1854-).

SCOTT, SIR GEORGE GILBERT, English architect, born in Buckinghamshire, son of Scott the commentator, was the builder or restorer of buildings both in England and on the Continent after the Gothic, and wrote several works on architecture (1811-1874).

SCOTT, SIR GILES GILBERT, British architect, and grandson of the preceding. He was educated at Beaumont, and is known chiefly as the designer of Liverpool cathedral, the new buildings at Clare, Cambridge, and a number of churches throughout the country (1880-).

SCOTT, MICHAEL, a sage with the reputation of a wizard, who lived about the end of the 12th and beginning of the 13th centuries, of whose art as a magician many legends are related.

SCOTT, SIR PERCY MORETON, British admiral. Entering the navy at the age of 13, he became a rear-admiral in 1905, and specialised in naval gunnery; he was with the Naval Brigade in the Boer War, taking part in the relief of Ladysmith; during the Great War he was in charge of London's anti-aircraft gun defences (1853-1924).

SCOTT, ROBERT FALCON, British naval officer and explorer. Born at Devonport, he early joined the navy, and in 1900 took the ship Discovery to the Antarctic, returning in 1904 after making important discoveries. Promoted to captain, he left England again in 1910 in the Terra Nova, and with Wilson, Oates, Evans, and Bowers succeeded in reaching the Pole on January 13, 1912, to find Amundsen (q.v.) had preceded him by three weeks. On the return journey he and his colleagues perished in a blizzard (1868-1912).

SCOTT, THOMAS, commentator, born in Lincolnshire; became rector of Aston Sandford, Bucks.; was a Calvinist in theology, author of the "Force of Truth" and "Essays on Religion," the work by which he is best known being his "Commentary on the Bible," a scholarly exposition (1747-1821).

SCOTT, SIR WALTER, the great novelist, born in Edinburgh, through both father and mother of Scottish Border blood; his father, a lawyer, his mother a little, kindly woman, full of most vivid memories, awakening an interest in him to which he owed much; was a healthy child, but from teething and other causes lost the use of his right leg when 18 months old, which determined, to a marked extent, the course of his life; spent many of the months of his childhood in the country, where he acquired that affection for all natural objects which never left him, and a kindness of soul which all the lower animals that approached him were quick to recognise; he was from the first homebred, his school training yielding results of the smallest account to his general education; as a writer of books he owed less to book-knowledge than his own shrewd observation; he proceeded from the High School at 15 to his father's office and classes at the University, and at both he continued to develop his own bent more than the study of law or learning; at his sixteenth year the bursting of a blood-vessel prostrated him and enforced a period of perfect stillness, but during this time he was able to prosecute sundry quiet studies, and laid up in his memory great stores of knowledge. Professionally he was a lawyer, but the duties of his profession were not his chief interest, and though he received at length a sheriffship worth £300 a year, and a clerkship to the court worth £1500, he early turned his mind to seek promotion elsewhere, and chose a literary career. His early literary efforts were some translations in verse from the German, but his first great success was the publication, in 1802, of "The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and in this he first gave evidence of the native force and bent of his genius. This was followed the same year by "Gladwin Castle," a poem instinct with military ardour, and by "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" in 1805, the first poem which gained him popular favour, by "Marmion" in 1808, and by "The Lord of the Isles" in 1814. Much as the rise of Scott's fame was owing to his poetical works, it is on the ground of his prose writings, as the freest and fullest exhibition of his genius, that it is now mainly founded. The period of his productivity in this line extended over 18 years in all, commencing with the year 1814, by which time he had built his home of Abbotsford on the Tweed, near Galaashiel. This was the year of the publication of "Waverley," which was followed by that of "Guy Rannering," "The Antiquary," "Rob Roy," "Old Mortality," and "The Heart of Midlothian." In the year 1819, when he was smitten down by an illness, the effects of which were seen in his after-work. "The Bride of Lammermoor," "Ivanhoe," "The Monastery," "The Abbot," "Kenilworth," and "The Pirate" belong to the years that succeeded that illness, to which may be added "Redgauntlet" and "The Fortunes of Nigel," together with "Quentin Durward" and "Woodstock." His later years were clouded by the failure of the publishing house of Constable and by a burden of debt, but he continued to write to the end, busying himself with a romance, "The Knights of Malta" (1771-1832).

SCOTT, WILLIAM BELL, painter and poet, brother of David Scott (q.v.), born in Edinburgh; did criticism and wrote on artists; is best known by his autobiography (1811-1890).

SCRIBES, THE, (i.e. writers), a non-priestly class among the Jews devoted to the study and exposition of the Law, who rose to a position of importance and influence in the Jewish community, and were known in the days of Christ also by the name of Lawyers, and were addressed as Rabbis; their disciples were taught to regard them with a reverence superior to that paid to father or mother, the spiritual parent being reckoned as much above the natural as the spirit and its interests are above the flesh and its interests.

SCRIBLERUS, MARTINUS, the subject of a fictitious memoir published in Pope's works and ascribed to Arbuthnot (q.v.), intended to ridicule the pedantry which affects to know everything, but knows nothing to any purpose; this and other notable contributions, including "Gulliver's Travels," were issued under the auspices of the Scriblerus Club, which was founded by Swift in 1714.

SCRIVENER, FREDERICK HENRY AMBROSE, New Testament critic, born in Herefordshire; educated at Cambridge; headmaster of Falmouth School from 1844 to 1850, and after 16 years' residence of Germany became vicar of Hendon and prebendary of Ely; his "Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament" ranks as a standard work; was editor of the Cambridge Paraphrase Bible, and one of the New Testament reviewers (1813-1891).

SCROGGS, SIR WILLIAM, an infamous Judge of Charles II.'s reign, who became Chief Justice of the King's Bench in 1678, and whose name is associated with all manner of injustice and legal corruption; was impeached in 1680, and pensioned off by the King; d. 1683.

SCUDERY, MADELINE DE, French novelist, born in Havre, came to Paris in her youth, and there lived to an extreme old age; was a prominent figure in the social and literary life of the city, collaborated at first with her brother Georges, but subsequently was responsible herself for a set of love romances of an inordinate length, but of great popularity in their day, e.g. "Le Grand Cyrus" and "Cydre," &c., in which a real gift for sparkling dialogue is swallowed up in a mass of improbable adventures and prurish sentimentalism (1607-1701).

SCULLIN, JAMES HENRY, Australian politician, born in Victoria, he earned his living as a journalist, and in 1910 he became a Labour member in the House of Representatives. In 1928 he was elected Leader of the Opposition, and in 1929 succeeded to the Premiership (1876-1951).

SCULPTURED STONES, a name specially applied to certain varieties of commemorative monuments (usually rough hewn slabs or boulders, and in a few cases well-shaped crosses) of early Christian date found in various parts of the British Isles, bearing lettered and symbolic inscriptions of a rude sort and ornamental designs resembling those found on Celtic MSS. of the Gospels, lettered inscriptions are in Latin, Ogham (q.v.), and Scandinavian and Anglian runes, while some are unlettered; usually found near ancient ecclesiastical sites, and their date is approximately fixed according to the character of the ornamentation; some of these stones date as late as the 11th century; the Scottish stones are remarkable for their elaborate decoration and for certain symbolic characters to which as yet no interpretation has been found.

SCURVY, a disease resulting from a diet deficient in fresh fruit and vegetables; caused by the lack of certain vitamins (q.v.) contained in these foods; the disease was at one time common among sailors who existed for long periods on salt meat.

SCUTARI, a town of Turkey, on the Bosphorus, opposite Constantinople; has several fine mosques, bazars, &c.; large barracks on the outskirts were used as hospitals by Florence Nightingale during the Crimean War; has large and impressive cemeteries, chief manufactures are of silks, cottons, &c. Also name of a small town situated at the S. end of Lake Scutari, 18 by 16 mi., in North Albania.

SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS, two rocks opposite each other at a narrow pass of the strait between Italy and Sicily, in the cave of one of which dwelt Scylla, a fierce monster that barked like a dog, and under the cliff of the other of which dwelt Charybdis, a monster that sucked up everything that came near it, so that any ship passing between in avoiding the one became a prey to the other.

SCYTHIANS, the name of a people of various tribes who occupied the steppes of E.E. of Europe and W. of Asia adjoining eastward, and were of nomadic habit; kept herds of cattle and horses, and were mostly in a semi-savage state beyond the pale of civilisation; the region they occupied is called Scythia.

SEABURY, SAMUEL, American prelate, born in Groton, Connecticut, graduated at Yale and studied medicine in Edinburgh; entered the Church of England in 1763, and devoted himself at first to missionary work; subsequently held "livings" in Long Island and New York State in 1782; was appointed bishop by the clergy of Connecticut; sought consecration at the hands of the English archbishops, who were afraid to grant it and had to resort to the bishops of the Scottish Episcopal Church for the purpose; did notable work in establishing and consolidating Episcopacy in America (1720-1796).

SEAHAM, town in Durham, on the coast, 5 m. from Sunderland; it has an important harbour, blast furnaces, and factories; for some years it has returned Ramsay MacDonald as its parliamentary representative.

SEARLE, GEORGE FREDERICK CHARLES, British scientist, lecturer at Cambridge; carried out a number of important researches and published papers on elasticity, optics, and electricity (1864-).

SEA-SERPENT, a marine monster of serpent-like shape which is generally accepted as mythical, although several seemingly authentic accounts have been circulated in attestation to its existence. The subject has given rise to much speculation and conjecture on the part of naturalists, but opinion mostly favours the supposition that these gigantic serpent-like appearances are caused by enormous cuttlefish swimming on the surface of the water, with their 20 ft. long tentacles elongated fore and aft. Other fishes which might also be mistaken for the sea-serpent are the basking-shark, tape-fish, and marine snake. The true sea-serpents, found in tropical seas, form a sub-family of the front-fanged "Colubines"; there are over 50 species of them belonging to the genera Hydrophis, Platurus, Hydruis, and Phaio; all are venomous.

SEATON, JOHN COLBORNE, 1ST BARON, British soldier. Born in Lyndhurst, Hants., and educated at Christ's Hospital, he entered the army at the age of 16; he took part in the Peninsular campaign and was in charge of a regiment at Waterloo; he put down a rising in Canada in 1838, for which service he was raised to the peerage; he became a field-marshal two years before his death (1778-1863).

SEBASTIAN, ST., a Roman and soldier at Narbonne, martyred under Diocletian when it was discovered he was a Christian; is depicted in art bound naked to a tree and pierced with arrows, and sometimes with arrows in his hand offering them to Heaven on his knees, he having been shot first with arrows and then beaten to death (255-288).

SEBASTOPOL, a fortified seaport of Russia, situated on a splendid natural harbour (4½ m. by ½), on the S.W. of the Crimea; during the Crimean War was destroyed and captured by the French and English after a siege lasting from October 9, 1854, to September 18, 1855; has, since 1885, been restored, and is now an important naval station; exports large quantities of grain.

SECCHI, ANGELO, Italian astronomer, first suggested the classification of the stars by their spectral type (q.v.) (1818-1878).

SECKER, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, born in Sibthorpe, Nottinghamshire; first studied medicine and graduated at Leyden in 1721, but was induced to take orders, and after a year at Oxford was ordained a priest in 1723; held various livings till his appointment to the Primacy in 1758; noted as a wise and kindly ecclesiastic (1693-1768).

SECOND-RIGHT, name given to the power of seeing things future or distant, and embracing telepathy and clairvoyance; a power superstitiously ascribed to certain people in the Highlands of Scotland.

SECRETIN, discovered by Baylis and Starling in 1902, is a hormone produced in the small intestine, which passes into the blood and causes the pancreas to secrete the digestive juices.

SECULARIST, the name given to one who, discarding as irrelevant all theories and observances bearing upon the other world and its interests, holds that we ought to confine our attention solely to the immediate problems and duties of this, independently of all presumed dependence on revelation and communications from a higher sphere.

SEDAN, a town of France, in department of Ardennes, on the Meuse, 164 m. N.E. of Paris; once a strong fortress, but dismantled in 1870, when in 1870 Napoleon III. and 86,000 men under Marshal MacMahon surrendered to the Germans; noted for its cloth manufactures. Previous to the Edict of Nantes was a celebrated centre of Huguenot industry and theological learning.

SEDAN CHAIRS, conveyances with one seat, carried on poles by two men; they were first used in England in 1581, and were in general use from 1650 to about 1750; the name is said to be derived from the town of Sedan, whence the chairs originally came.

SEDDGEMOOR, district in central Somersetshire, 5 m. S.E. of Bridgwater, scene of a famous battle between the troops of James II. and those of the Duke of Monmouth on July 6, 1685, in which the latter were completely routed.

SEDDGWICK, ADAM, geologist, born in Dent, Yorkshire; graduated at Cambridge in 1808, became a Fellow in the same year, and in 1818 was elected to the Woodward chair of Geology; co-operated with Murchison in the study of the geological formation of the Alps and the Devonian system of England; strongly conservative in his scientific theories, he stoutly opposed the Darwinian theory of the origin of species; his best work was contributed in papers to the Geological Society of London, of which he was President 1820-1831; published "British Palaeozoic Rocks and Fossils"; he was president of the British Association at Cambridge in 1833 (1785-1873).

SEDIMENTARY ROCKS are those laid down as deposits, chiefly by water action; many of them have been formed on the sea bottom of the material brought down by rivers, or as in the case of some limestones, of the remains of animals; some sedimentary rocks have been formed by the deposition of salts from solution in lakes; some by accumulations of volcanic ashes, and others by glacial action; sedimentary rocks are classified as arenaceous (e.g. sandstones and grits), argillaceous (e.g. muds, clays, and shales), calcareous (e.g. chalk and limestones), and pyroclastic (e.g. volcanic ashes). Deposits such as peat and coal are formed of the remains of plants.

SEELEY, SIR JOHN ROBERT, author of "Ecce Homo," born in London; studied at Cambridge, became professor of History there in 1869 on Kingsley's retirement; his "Ecce Homo" was published in 1865, a piece of perfect literary workmanship, but which in its denial of the self-originated spirit of Christ offended orthodox belief and excited much adverse criticism; wrote in 1882 a work entitled "Natural Religion" in which he showed the same want of sympathy with supernatural ideas, as also several historical works (1834-1896).

SEGMENT, the part of a circle cut off by a chord; a segment greater than a semicircle is known as a major segment, one less than a semicircle as a minor segment.

SEGOVIA, a quaint old Spanish city, capital of a province of the same name; crowns a rocky height looking down on the river Kreema, 32 m. NW. of Madrid; its importance dates from Roman times; has a great aqueduct, built in Trajan's reign, and a fine Moorish castle and Gothic cathedral; cloth-weaving the only important industry.

SEGRAVE, SIR HENRY, British racing motorist. He was born in America of British parents, and was educated at Eton; during the Great War he saw active service in the Royal Air Force. In 1927 he established a world's record at Daytona, Florida, of 203 miles an hour, and with another car set up a further record of 231 miles an hour in 1929 on the same track; he was knighted on his return after this feat. While engaged on an attempt to beat the world record for motor boat racing in 1930 his boat capsized on Windermere and he was killed (1890-1930).

SEGU, a town of West Africa, on the Joliba, 400 m. SW. of Timbuctoo; chiefly occupied by trading Arabs; once the capital of a now decayed native State.

SEINE, an important river of France, rises in the tableland of Laurens, takes a winding course to the NW, passing many important towns, Troyes, Fontainebleau, Paris, St. Denis, and Rouen, and discharges into the English Channel by a broad estuary after a course of 482 m., of which 350 are navigable.

SEINE, the smallest but most populous department of France, entirely surrounded by the department of Seine-et-Oise; Paris and its adjacent villages cover a considerable portion of the area; presents a richly wooded, undulating surface, traversed by the Seine in a NW. direction.

SEINE-ET-MARNE, a north-midland department of France lying E. of Seine; the Marne crosses the N. and the Seine the S.; has a fertile soil, which grows in abundance cereals, vegetables, and fruits; many fine woods, including Fontainebleau Forest, diversify its undulating surface. Meaux (capital) and Fontainebleau are among its important towns.

SEINE-ET-OISE, a department of NW. France, encloses the department of Seine; grain is grown in well-cultivated plains and the vine on pleasant hill slopes; is intersected by several tributaries of the Seine, and the N. is prettily wooded. Versailles is the capital; Sévres and St. Cloud are other interesting places.

SEINE-INFÉRIEURE, a maritime department of North-West France, in Normandy, facing the English Channel; is for the most part a fertile plain, watered by the Seine and smaller streams, and diversified by fine woods and the hills of Saux; is a fruit and cider producing district; has flourishing manufactures. Rouen is the capital, and Havre and Dieppe are important trading centres.

SEISMOLOGY, the study of earthquakes and their causes and effects.

SEISMOMETER, an instrument for recording earthquake shocks; by means of its readings the distance and direction of a shock can be calculated.

SELBORNE, ROUNDELL PALMER, EARL OF, Lord Chancellor, born in Oxfordshire; called to the bar in 1837, and after a brilliant career at Oxford entered Parliament in 1847, and in 1861 became Solicitor-General in Palmerston's ministry, receiving at the same time a knighthood; two years later was advanced to the Attorney-Generalship; in 1872 was elected Lord Chancellor, a position he retained till 1874, and again held from 1880 to 1885; refused to adopt Gladstone's Home Rule policy for Ireland and joined the Liberal-Unionists, but declined to take office under Lord Salisbury; was raised to an earldom in 1882, received various honorary degrees; greatly interested himself in hymnology and edited "The Book of Præses"; wrote also several works on Church questions (1812-1895).

SELBY, a market town of Yorkshire, on the Ouse, 15 m. S. of York; has a noted cruciform abbey church, founded in the 12th century and exhibiting various styles of architecture; has some boatbuilding; manufactures flax, ropes, leather, and bricks.

SELBY, 1ST VISCOUNT (William Court Gully), British politician. Son of a doctor, he was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and went to the bar; in 1866 he became M.P. for Carlisle as a Liberal, and in 1895 was elected Speaker of the House, a position he held till 1905, when he was raised to the peerage (1835-1909).

SELDEN, JOHN, born in Salvington, Sussex; adopted law as a profession, and was trained at Clifford's Inn and the Inner Temple, London; successful as a lawyer, he yet found time for scholarly pursuits, and acquired a great reputation by the publication of various erudite works bearing on old English jurisprudence and antiquities generally; a "History of Tithes" (1618), in which he combats the idea that "tithes" are divinely instituted, got him into trouble with the Church; was imprisoned in 1621 for encouraging Parliament to repudiate James's absolutist claims; from his entrance into Parliament in 1625 continued to play an important part throughout the troublous reign of Charles; sincerely attached to the Parliamentary side, he was one of the framers of the Petition of Right, and suffered imprisonment with Holles and the others; sat in the Long Parliament, but, out of sympathy with the extremists, disapproved of the execution of Charles; held various offices, e.g. Keeper of the Rolls and Records in the Tower; continued to write learned and voluminous works on Biblical and historical subjects, but is best remembered for his charming "Table-talk," a book of which Coleridge remarked, "There is more worthy bullion silver in this book than I can find in the same number of pages of any unimpaired writer" (1584-1654).

SELENE, in the Greek mythology the moon-goddess, the sister of Helios, and designated Phoebe as he was Phoebus; she became by Endymion the mother of 50 daughters.

SELENIUM, an element resembling sulphur in some of its chemical properties, first discovered by Berzelius; it plays an important part in one of the methods of phototelegraphy.

SELF-DENYING ORDINANCE, a resolution of the Long Parliament passed in 1644, whereby the members bound themselves not to accept certain executive offices, particularly commands in the army.

SELIM I., a warlike sultan of Turkey, who, having dethroned and put to death his father, Bajazet II., entered upon a victorious career of military aggrandisement, overcoming the Persians in 1515, conquering and annexing Egypt, Syria, and the Hejaz in 1517, finally winning for himself the position of Imam or head of the Mohammedan world; greatly strengthened his country, and strove according to his lights to deal justly with and ameliorate the condition of the peoples whom he conquered (1467-1520).

SELJUKS, a Turkish people who in the 10th century, headed by a chief named Seljuk (whence their name), broke away from their allegiance to the Khan of Kirghiz, adopted the Mohammedan faith, and subsequently conquered Bokhara, but were driven across the Oxus and settled in Khorasan; under Toghril Beg, grandson of Seljuk, they in the 11th century won for themselves a wide empire in Asia, including the provinces of Syria and Asia Minor, whose rulers, by their cruel persecution of Christian pilgrims, led to the Crusade movement in Europe. The Seljuks were in part gradually absorbed by the advancing Mongol tribes, while numbers fled westward, where they were at length incorporated in the Ottoman Empire in the 14th century.

SELKIRK, county town of Selkirkshire, on the Ettrick, 40 m. SE. of Edinburgh; famed at one time for its "Souters" (shoemakers), who figured in Border conflicts; is a centre of the manufacture of tweeds.

SELKIRK, ALEXANDER, sailor, who was put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, S. America, and whose experiences inspired Defoe to write his "Robinson Crusoe" (1676-1721). See DOVER, THOMAS.

SELKIRKSHIRE, a south inland county of Scotland; extends S. from the corner of Midlothian to Dum-frishire, between Peebles (W.) and Roxburgh (E.); the grassy slopes of its hills afford splendid pasturage, and sheep-farming is a flourishing industry; manufactures are mainly confined to Galashiels and Melkirk; is traversed by the Ettrick and the Yarrow, whose romantic valleys are associated with much of the finest ballad literature of Scotland.

SELLE, river in France: rising near Le Cateau, it flows N. to join the Schelde. It was the scene of fighting in October, 1918, when British and American troops gained a victory over a German force superior in numbers: some 20,000 prisoners and 475 guns were captured.

SELWYN, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, a noted wit in the social and literary life of London in Horace Walpole's time, born, of good parentage, in Gloucestershire; was expelled from Oxford in 1743 for alleged blasphemy; four years later entered Parliament, and supported the Court party, and received various government favours; his vivacious wit won him ready entrance into the best London and Parisian society; is the chief figure in Jesse's entertaining "George Selwyn and his Contemporaries" (1719-1791).

SELWYN, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, the first bishop of New Zealand, in which capacity he wrought so zealously that his diocese, by his extension of Episcopacy, was subdivided into seven; on his return to England he was made bishop of Lichfield; Selwyn College, Cambridge, was endowed in his memory (1809-1878).

SEMAPHORE, a name applied to the mechanism employed for telegraphing purposes prior to the discovery of the electric telegraph; invented in 1787 by Richard Edgeworth, but first extensively used by the French in 1794, and afterwards adopted by the Admiralty in England; consisted at first of six shutters set in two rotating circular frames, which, by opening and shutting in various ways, were capable of conveying sixty-three distinct signals; these were raised on the tops of wooden towers erected on hills; later a different form was adopted consisting of a mast and two arms worked by winches. The speed at which messages could be transmitted was very great; thus a message could be sent from London to Portsmouth and an answer be received all within 45 seconds. The railway signal now in use is a form of semaphore.

SEMELE, in the Greek mythology the daughter of Cadmus and the mother of Dionysus by Zeus, was tempted by Hera to pray Zeus to show himself to her in his glory, who, as pledged to give her all she asked, appeared before her as the god of thunder and consumed her by the lightning. See DIONYSUS.

SEMINOLES, a nomadic tribe of American Indians who from 1832 to 1839 offered a desperate resistance to the Americans before yielding up their territory SE. of the Mississippi (Florida, etc.); finally settled in the Indian Territory, where they now number some 3000 and receive an annuity from the American Government; missionary enterprises among them have been successful in establishing schools and churches.

SEMPALATINSK, a mountainous province of Asiatic Russia, stretching between Lake Balkash (S.) and Tomsk; encloses stretches of steppe-land on which cattle and horses are reared; some mining of silver, lead, and copper is also done. Sempalatinsk, the capital, stands on the Irtysh; has two annual fairs, and is an important trading mart.

SEMI-PELAGIANISM. See PELAGIUS.

SEMITRANIS, legendary queen of Assyria, to whom tradition ascribes the founding of Babylon with its hanging gardens, and who is said to have surpassed in valour and glory her husband Ninus, the founder of Nineveh; she seems to have been in reality the Venus or Antarte of the Assyrian mythology. The story goes that when a child she was deserted by her mother and fed by doves.

SEMITRANIS OF THE NORTH, a name given to Margaret, Queen of Denmark; also to Catharine II. of Russia.

SEMITRANISK, a mountainous province of Asiatic Russia, stretches S. of Lake Balkash to East Turkestan and Ferghana on the S.; is traversed E. and W. by the lofty ranges of the Alatau and Tianshan Mountains; the vast bulk of the inhabitants are Kirghiz, and engaged in raising horses, camels, and sheep.

SEMITIC RACES, races that are reputed descendants of Shem, including the Jews, the Assyrians, the Chaldeans, the Syrians, the Phœnicians, and the Arabs, and are all marked by common features; such appear in their language, their literature, their modes of thinking, social organisation, and religious belief. Their language is poor in inflection, has few or no compound verbs or substantives, has next to no power of expressing abstract ideas, and is of simple primitive structure or syntax. Their literature has neither the breadth nor the flow of that of Greece or Rome, but it is instead with a passion which often holds the very depths of being. In their modes of thinking they are taken up with concrete realities instead of abstractions, and hence they have contributed nothing to science or philosophy, much as they have done to faith. Their social order is patriarchal, with a leaning to a despotism, which in certain of them, such as the Jews and Arabs, goes higher and higher till it reaches God.

SEMMERING, a mountain of Styria, Austria, 60 m. SW. of Vienna, 4577 ft. above sea-level; is crossed by the Vienna and Trieste railway, which passes through 15 tunnels and over 16 viaducts.

SEMPACH, a small Swiss town, 9 m. NW. of Lucerne, on the Lake of Sempach; here on July 9, 1386, a body of 1500 Swiss soldiers completely routed the Austrians, 4000 strong, under Leopold, Duke of Austria. See WINKELRIED.

SEN, CHUNDER. See CHUNDER SEN.

SENAUCOUR, ÉTIENNE PIVERT DE, French writer, born in Paris; delicate in his youth; was driven by an unsympathetic father to quit his home at 19, and for some time lived at Geneva and Fribourg, where a brief period of happy married life was closed by the death of his young wife; returned to Paris in 1798; supported himself by writing, and later by a small Government pension granted by Louis Philippe; is best known as the author of "Obermann," a work of which Matthew Arnold wrote, "The stir of all the main forces by which modern life is and has been impelled, lives in the letters of Obermann" (1770-1846).

SENATE (i.e., "an assembly of elders"), a name first bestowed by the Romans on their supreme legislative and administrative assembly; its formation is traditionally ascribed to Romulus; its powers, at their greatest during the Republic, gradually diminished under the Emperors; in modern times is used to designate the "Upper House" in the legislature of various countries, e.g. France and the United States of America; is also the title of the governing body in many universities.

SENDAL, town in Japan, in the province of Miyagi, of which it is the capital; it is 225 m. from Tokio and is an important trading centre.

SENECA, LUCIUS ANNEIUS, philosopher, son of the following, born in Cordova, and brought to Rome when a child; practised as a pleader at the bar, studied philosophy, and became the tutor of Nero; acquired great riches; was charged with conspiracy by Nero, as a pretext, it is believed, to procure his wealth, and ordered to kill himself, which he did by opening his veins till he bled to death; he was of the Stoic school in philosophy, and wrote a number of treatises bearing chiefly on morals; d. A.D. 65.

SENECA, MARCUS ANNEIUS, rhetorician, born in Cordova; taught rhetoric at Rome, whither he went at the time of Augustus, and where he died A.D. 82.

SENEGAL, an important river of West Africa, formed by the junction, at Bakule, of two head-streams rising in the highlands of Western Soudan; flows NW., W., and SW., a course of 700 m., and discharges into the Atlantic 10 m. below St. Louis; navigation is somewhat impeded by a sand-bar at its mouth, and by cataracts and rapids in the upper reaches.

SENEGAL, a French colony of West Africa, lying along the banks of the Senegal River. See SENEGAMBIA.

SENEGAMBIA, a tract of territory lying chiefly within the basins of the rivers Senegal and Gambia, West Africa, stretching from the Atlantic, between Cape Blanco and the mouth of the Gambia, inland to the Niger; embraces the French colony of Senegal, and various ill-defined native States under the suzerainty of France; the interior part is also called the French Soudan; the vast expanse of the contiguous Sahara in the N., and stretches of territory on the S., extending to the Gulf of Guinea, are also within the French sphere of influence, all together forming an immense territory, of which St. Louis (q.v.), in Senegambia proper, is considered the capital; ground-nuts, gums, india-rubber, and gold are the chief exports.

SENECHAL, an important functionary at the courts of Frankish princes, whose duty it was to superintend household feasts and ceremonies, functions equivalent to those of the English High Steward.

SENNAAR, capital of a district of the Eastern Soudan, which lies between the Blue and the White Nile, situated on the Blue Nile, 160 m. SE. of Khartoum.

SENNACHERIB, a king of Assyria, whose reign extended from 702 to 681 B.C., and was distinguished by the projection and execution of extensive public works; he endeavoured to push his conquests westward, but was baffled in Judaea by the miraculous destruction of his army. See 2 Kings xix. 35.

SENS, an old cathedral town of France, on the Yonne, 70 m. SE. of Paris; the cathedral is a fine Gothic structure of the 12th century; has also an archbishop's palace, and is still surrounded by massive stone walls of Roman construction; does a good trade in corn, wine, and wool.

SENTUSLI, a Mohammedan brotherhood in the Soudan, founded by Mohammed-es-Senussi from Mostaganem, in Algeria, who flourished between 1840 and 1900. The brotherhood, remarkable for its austere and fanatical zeal, has radiated into many parts of N. Africa, and exercises considerable influence, fostering resistance to the encroachments of the invading European powers.

SEPOY, the name given to a native of India employed as a soldier in the British service in India.

SEPTEMBER, the ninth month of the year, so called as having been the seventh in the Roman calendar.

SEPTEMBER MASSACRES, an indiscriminate slaughter in Paris which began on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 2, 1792, when 30 priests on their way to prison were torn from the carriages that conveyed them, and massacred one after the other, all save Abbé Secard, in the streets by an infuriated mob; they continued thereafter through horror after horror for a hundred hours all done in the name of justice and in mock form of law—a true Reign of Terror.

SEPTUAGINT, a version, and the oldest of any known to us, of the Hebrew Scriptures in Greek, executed at Alexandria, in Egypt, by different translators at different periods, commencing with 280 B.C.; it is known as the Alexandria version, while the name Septuagint, or LXX., was given to it on the ground of the tradition that it was the work of 70, or rather 72, Jews, who, it is alleged, had been brought from Palestine for the purpose, and were fabled, according to one tradition, to have executed the whole in as many days, and according to another, to have each done the whole apart from the rest, with the result that the version of each was found to correspond word for word with that of all the others; it began with the translation of the Pentateuch and was continued from that time till 130 B.C. by the translation of the rest, the whole being in reality the achievement of several independent workmen, who executed their parts, some with greater, some with less, ability and success; it is often literal to a painful degree, and it swarms with such pronounced Hebraisms, that a pure Greek would often fail to understand it. It was the version current everywhere at the time of the planting of the Christian Church, and the numerous quotations in the New Testament from the Old are, with few exceptions, quotations from it.

SEPULVEDA, JUAN GINEZ DE, Spanish historian, born in Pozo-Blanco, near Cordova; in 1536 became historiographer to Charles V. and tutor to the future Philip II.; was subsequently canon of Salamanca; author of several historical works, of which a "History of Charles V." is the most important, a work characterised by broad humanistic proclivities unusual in his day and country; d. 1574.

SERAGLIO, in its restricted sense applied in the East to a harem or women's quarters in a royal household; the former residence of the sultan of Turkey, occupies a beautiful site on the E. side of Constantinople, on a projecting piece of land between the Golden Horn and the Sea of Marmara, enclosing within its 3 m. of wall government buildings, mosques, gardens, &c., chief of which is the harem, occupying an inner enclosure.

SERAING, a manufacturing town of Belgium, on the Meuse, 4 m. SW. of Liège; noted for its extensive machine-shops (locomotives, &c.); established in 1817 by John Cockerill, and now, with forges, coal-mines, &c., giving considerable employment.

SERAYEVO, a city in Jugoslavia, formerly the capital of Bosnia, on the Miljacka. The town is noted chiefly for the assassination of Francis Ferdinand of Austria on June 28, 1914, a crime which led to the Great War.

SERAMPUR, a town of modern aspect in India, on the Hooghly, 13 m. N. of Calcutta; originally Danish, was purchased by the British in 1846; manufactures paper and mats, and is associated with the successful missionary enterprise of the Baptists (Carey, Marshman, and Ward).

SERAPHIM, angels of the highest order and of ethereal temper, represented as guarding with veiled faces the Divine glory, and considered to have originally denoted the lightning darting out from the black thunder-cloud.

SERASKIER, a Turkish general, in especial the commander-in-chief or minister of war.

SERBIA, formerly SERVIA, a kingdom of Europe occupying a central position in the Balkan Peninsula between Austria (N.) and Turkey (S. and W.), with Rumania and Bulgaria on the E.; it now forms part of Jugoslavia (q.v.) with an area of 34,000 sq. m. Austria's declaration of war on her in July, 1914, was the start of the Great War, during which Serbia fought on the side of the Allies, and on the conclusion of which she decided to throw in her lot with the new nation of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, called Jugoslavia. There are many mountains, but wide fertile valleys produce in great abundance wheat, maize, and other cereals, grapes and plums (an important export when dried), while immense herds of swine are reared on the outskirts of the oak-forests; is well watered by the Morava flowing through the centre and by the Save and Danube on the N.; climate varies considerably according to elevation; not much manufacturing is done, but minerals abound and are partially wrought; the Serbs are of Slavonic stock, high-spirited and patriotic, clinging tenaciously to old-fashioned methods and ideas; have produced a notable national literature, rich in lyric poetry. Originally emigrants in the 7th century from districts round the Carpathians, the Serbians had by the 14th century established a kingdom considerably larger than their present domain; were conquered by the Turks in 1389, and held in subjection till 1815, when a national rising won them Home Rule, but remained tributary to Turkey until 1877, when they proclaimed their independence, which was confirmed by the Treaty of Berlin in 1878; capital is Belgrade.

SERBONTIAN BOG, a quagmire in Egypt in which arimæes were fabled to be swallowed up and lost; applied to any situation in which one is entangled from which extrication is difficult.

SERFS, under the feudal system a class of labourers whose position differed only from that of slaves in being attached to the soil and so protected from being sold from hand to hand like a chattel, although they could be transferred with the land; liberty could be won by purchase, military service, or by residing a year and a day in a borough; these and economic changes brought about their gradual emancipation in the 15th and 16th centuries; mining serfs, however, existed in Scotland as recently as the 18th century, and in Russia their emancipation only took place in 1861.

SERINGAPATAM, a decayed city of S. India, formerly capital of Mysore State, situated on an island in the Kaveri, 10 m. NE. of Mysore city; in the latter part of the 18th century was the stronghold of Tippono Sahib, who was successfully besieged and slain by the British in 1799; has interesting ruins.

SERJEANT-AT-ARMS, an officer attendant on the Speaker of the House of Commons, whose duty it is to preserve order and arrest any offender against the rules of the House.

SERPENT WORSHIP, or Ophidiolatry, was practised in ancient times by the Egyptians and has survived in India and Africa; the symbol of the snake is prevalent in early European art; in North and Western America this form of worship long obtained among aboriginal Indians. Symbolically, the serpent represented veneration, from the shedding of its skin, taken to typify eternity; generally it was regarded as a guardian spirit.

SERPENTINE, a crystalline green mineral composed of silicate of magnesia.

SERPUKOFF, an ancient and still prosperous town of Russia, on the Nara, 57 m. N. of Moscow; has a cathedral, and manufactures cottons and woollens.

SERRANO Y DOMINGUEZ, Duke de la Torre, Spanish statesman and marshal; won distinction in the wars against the Carlists, and, turning politician, became in 1845 a senator and favourite of Queen Isabella; was prominent during the political unrest and changes of her reign; joined Prim in the revolution of 1868, defeated the queen's troops; became president of the Ministry; commander-in-chief of the army, and in 1869 Regent of Spain, a position he held till Amadeus's succession in 1871; won victories against the Carlists in 1872 and 1874; was again at the head of the executive during the last months of the republic, but retired on the accession of Alfonso XII., continued in active politics till his death (1810-1885).

SERTORIUS, QUINTUS, Roman statesman and general; joined the democratic party under Marius (q.v.) against Sulla; retired to Spain on the return of Sulla to Rome, where he sought to introduce Roman civilisation; was assassinated 73 B.C.

SERVETUS, MICHAEL, physician, born in Fudeia, in Navarre; had a leaning to theology, and passing into Germany associated with the Reformers; adopted Socinianism, and came under ban of the orthodox, and was burnt alive at Geneva, after a trial of two months, under sanction, it is said, of Calvin (1511-1553).

SERVILIUS TULLIUS, the sixth king of Rome, from 578 to 534 B.C., divided the Roman territory into 30 tribes, and the people into 5 classes, which were further divided into centuries.

SESOSTRIS, a legendary monarch of Egypt, alleged to have achieved universal empire at a very remote antiquity, and to have executed a variety of public works by means of the captives he brought home from his conquests, which extended to India.

SESTERTIUS, a Roman coin either bronze or silver, one-fourth of a denarius, originally worth 2½ asses but afterwards 4 asses, up to the time of Augustus was worth fully 2½, and subsequently one-eighth less; Sesterterium, a Roman "money of account," never a coin, equalled 1000 sestertii, and was valued at 28 1/4.

SETTLE, ELEKANAH, a playwright who lives in the pages of Dryden's satire "Absalom and Achitophel"; was an Oxford man and littérateur in London; enjoyed a brief season of popularity as author of "Cambyses," and "The Empress of Morocco"; degenerated into a "city poet and a puppet-show keeper," and died in the Charterhouse; was the object of Dryden's and Pope's scathing sarcasms (1648-1724).

SETTLEMENT ACT OF, passed by Parliament in 1701, settled the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland on the Electress Sophia of Hanover and her heirs; the Act was designed to prevent the crown reverting to the Stuarts, and also stipulated that kings of England must be members of the established Church.

SETUBAL (English, St. Ubes), a fortified seaport of Portugal, at the mouth of the Sado, on a bay of the same name, 17 m. S.E. of Lisbon; has a good trade in wine, salt, and oranges; in the neighbourhood is a remarkable stalactite cave.

SEVEN CHAMPIONS OF CHRISTENDOM, St. George, of England; St. Denis, of France; St. James, of Spain; St. Anthony, of Italy; St. Andrew, of Scotland; St. Patrick, of Ireland; and St. David, of Wales—often alluded to by old writers.

SEVEN DEADLY SINS, Pride, Wrath, Envy, Lust, Gluttony, Avarice, and Sloth.

SEVEN DOLOURS OF THE VIRGIN, the predilection of Simeon (Luke II. 35); the flight into Egypt; the loss of the child in Jerusalem; the sight of her Son bearing the cross; the sight of Him upon the cross; the descent from the cross; and the entombment—the festival in connection with which is celebrated on the Friday before Palm Sunday.

SEVEN SAGES OF GREECE, Solon of Athens, his motto "Know thyself"; Chilo of Sparta, his motto "Consider the end"; Thales of Miletus, his motto "Whoso hateth suretyship is sure"; Bias of Priene, his motto "Most men are bad"; Cleobulus of Lindos, his motto "Avoid extremes"; Pittacus of Mitylene, his motto "Seize Time by the forelock"; Periander of Corinth, his motto "Nothing is impossible to industry."

SEVEN SLEEPERS, seven noble youths of Ephesus who, to escape the persecution of Decius, fled into a cave in Mount Cellion, where they fell asleep and woke up at the end of two centuries.

SEVEN WISE MASTERS, the title of a famous cycle of medieval tales which centre round the story of a young prince who, after baffling all efforts of former tutors, is at last, at the age of 20, instructed in all knowledge by Sindbad, one of the king's wise men, but having cast his horoscope Sindbad perceives the prince will die unless, after presentation at the court, he keeps silence for seven days; one of the king's wives, having in vain attempted to seduce the young man, in baffled rage accuses him to the king with tempting her virtue, and procures his death-sentence; the seven sages delay the execution by beguiling the king with stories till the seven days are passed, when the prince speaks and reveals the plot; an extraordinary number of variants exist in Eastern and Western languages, the earliest written version being an Arabian text of the 10th century; a great mass of literature has grown round the subject, which is one of the most perplexing, as well as interesting problems in the world of romance.

SEVEN WONDERS OF THE WORLD, the pyramids of Egypt, the hanging gardens of Babylon, the tomb of Mausolus, the temple of Diana at Ephesus, the Colossus of Rhodes, the statue of Jupiter by Phidias at Olympia, and the Pharos at Alexandria.

SEVEN YEARS' WAR, the name given to the third and most terrible struggle between Frederick the Great of Prussia and Maria Theresa, Empress of Austria, for the possession of Silesia, which embroiled almost all Europe in war, and which had far-reaching effects on the destinies of England and France as well as Prussia; began in 1756 by Frederick's successful advance on Dresden, anticipating Maria Theresa's intention of attempting the recovery of Silesia, lost to her in the previous two wars. With Austria were allied France, Sweden, Poland, and Russia, while Prussia was supported till 1761 by England. In 1762 Peter III. of Russia changed sides, and Frederick, sometimes victorious, often defeated, finally emerged successful in 1763, when the war was brought to a close by the Peace of Hubertsburg. Besides demonstrating the strength and genius of Frederick and raising immensely the prestige of Prussia, it enabled England to make complete her predominance in North America and to establish herself securely in India, while at the same time it gave the death-blow to French hopes of a colonial empire.

SEVERN, the second river of England, rises on the E. side of Plinlimmon, in Montgomeryshire, and flows in a circuitous southerly direction through Montgomeryshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, and Gloucestershire, falling into the Bristol Channel after a course of 210 m.; is navigable to Welshpool (180 m.); chief tributaries are the Tern, Wye, and the Stratford Avon; there is a "bore" perceptible 180 m. from the mouth.

SEVERUS, LUCIUS SEPTIMIUS, Roman emperor, born in Leptis Magna, in Africa; the only African to attain to the imperial throne; was in command at Pannonia, and elected emperor on the murder of Pertinax, and after conquering his rivals achieved victories in the East, especially against the Parthians; thereafter subdued a rebellion in Britain and secured South Britain against invasions from the north by a wall; died at York (146-211).

SÉVIGNÉ, MARQUISE DE, maiden name Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, the most charming of letter-writers, born in Paris; married at 18 the dissolute Marquis de Sévigné, who left her a widow at 25; her beauty and rare charms attracted many suitors, to one and all of whom, however, she turned a deaf ear, devoting herself with touching fidelity to her son and daughter, and finding all her happiness in their affection and in the social intercourse of a wide circle of friends; her fame rests on her letters, written chiefly to her daughter in Provence, which reflect the brightest and purest side of Parisian life, and contain the tender outpourings of her mother's heart in language of unstudied grace (1626-1696).

SÉVILLE, a celebrated Spanish city and river port on the Guadalquivir, 62 m. N.E. of Cadiz; an iron bridge connects it with Triana, a large suburb on the other side of the river; many of the old picturesque Moorish buildings have given place to modern and more commodious structures and broader streets; the great Gothic cathedral (15th century), containing paintings by Murillo, is among the finest in Europe; the Moorish royal palace, the great Roman aqueduct (in use until 1883), the museum, with masterpieces of Murillo and Velasquez, the university, archbishop's palace, Giralda Campanile, and the vast bull-ring, are noteworthy; chief manufactures embrace cigars, machinery, pottery, and textiles; while lead, quicksilver, wines, olive-oil, and fruits are exported; is capital of a province.

SÈVRES, a French town of the Seine, 104 m. SW. of Paris, celebrated for its fine porcelain wares (especially vases), the manufacture of which has been a State industry since 1755; has a school of mosaic work and museums for pottery ware of all ages and countries.

SÈVRES, DEUX-, a department of West France; is watered by two rivers and in the N. thickly wooded; a varied agriculture, cattle and mule breeding, and cloth manufacture are the principal industries. Niort is the capital.

SEWARD, ANNA, poetess, born in Exm, Derbyshire, but from the age of seven spent her life at Lichfield, where her father was residential canon; was a friend and indefatigable correspondent of Mrs. Piozzi, Dr. Darwin, Southey, Scott, and others; author of "Louisa," a novel in poetry, "Sonnets," and other poems, which had in their day considerable popularity; her correspondence is collected in 6 vols (1747-1809).

SEWARD, WILLIAM HENRY, American statesman, born in Florida, New York State; was called to the bar at Utica in 1822, and soon took rank as one of the finest forensic orators of his country; engaged actively in the politics of his State, of which he was governor in 1838 and 1840; entered the U.S. senate in 1849 as an abolitionist, becoming soon the recognised leader of the Anti-Slavery party; was put forward by the Republican party as a candidate for presidential nomination, but failing in this he zealously supported Lincoln, under whom he served as Secretary of State, conducting with notable success the foreign affairs of the country during the Civil War and up to the accession of President Grant in 1869; spent his closing years in travel and retirement (1801-1872).

SEWING MACHINE, an automatic device for sewing, invented in 1846 by an American, Elias Howe.

SEKAGESIMA SUNDAY, the second Sunday before the commencement of Lent.

SEXTANT, an instrument used in navigation (sometimes also in land-surveying) for measuring the altitudes of celestial bodies and their angular distances; consists of a graduated brass sector, the sixth part of a circle, and an arrangement of two small mirrors and telescope; invented in 1730 by John Hadley.

SEYCHELLES, a group of some 30 islands, largest Mahé (55 sq. m.), situated in the Indian Ocean, 600 m. N.E. of Madagascar; taken from the French by Britain in 1794, and now under the governor of Mauritius; are mountainous and mostly surrounded by coral reefs; export fibres, nuts, palm-oil, and tortoise-shell; Victoria, in Mahé, is the chief town and an imperial coaling station.

SEYMOUR, SIR EDWARD HOBART, British sailor. Entering the navy at the age of 12, he saw service in the Crimea, Egypt, and China; in 1900 he was in charge of the expedition against China, and the following year was made an admiral (1840-1920).

SFORZA (i.e. sterner), Italian family celebrated during the 15th and 16th centuries, founded by a military adventurer, a peasant of the name of Muzia Allendolo, who received the name; they became dukes of Milan, and began by hiring their services in war, in which they were always victorious, to the highest bidder, the first of the number to attain that rank being Francesco Sforza, the son of the founder, in 1450 (1401-1498), the last of the series being Francesco (1492-1535).

SGRAFFITO, a decorative or artistic painting, produced by layers of plaster applied to a moistened surface and afterwards operated on by a sharply pointed instrument so as to produce a picture.

SHACKLETON, SIR ERNEST HENRY, British explorer. Born in Ireland, and educated at Dulwich College, he joined the mercantile marine, and in 1900 served under Scott in the Discovery Antarctic expedition. From 1907 to 1909 and from 1914 to 1917 he was again in the Antarctic, and in 1922 died at sea while in command of a third expedition on board the Quest (1874-1922).

SHADWELL, THOMAS, dramatist, who lives as the "Blackfriars" of Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel," born of a good family, in Norfolk; studied law and adopted literature, in which he made a successful start with the comedy "The Sullen Lovers" (1668); his numerous plays, chiefly comedies, are of little poetic value, but serve as useful commentaries on the Restoration period; quarrelled with and satirised Dryden in the "Medal of John Bayes," which drew forth the crushing retort in Dryden's famous satire; succeeded Dryden as poet-laureate in 1688 (1640-1692).

SHAFITES, a sect of the Sunnites or orthodox Mohammedans, so called from Shafai, a descendant of Mohammed.

SHAFTESBURY, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, EARL OF, a notable politician, prominent in the times of Cromwell and Charles II., born of good parentage, in Dorsetshire; passed through Oxford and entered Lincoln's Inn; sat in the Short Parliament of 1640; changed from the Royalist to the Parliamentary side during the Civil War, and was a member of Cromwell's Council of State, but latterly attacked the Protector's Government, and was one of the chief promoters of the Restoration; Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1659, and later a member of the "Cabal." In 1672 he was created an earl and Lord Chancellor, but hoodwinked by Charles in the secret treaty of Dover, went over to the Opposition, lost his chancellorship, supported an anti-Catholic policy, joined himself with the Country Party, and intrigued with the Prince of Orange; came into power again, after the "Popish Plot," as the champion of toleration and Protestantism, became President of the Council, and passed the Habeas Corpus Act; his virulent attacks on James and espousal of Monmouth's cause brought about his arrest on a charge of high treason (1681), and although acquitted he deemed it expedient to flee to Holland, where he died; one of the ablest men of his age, but of somewhat inscrutable character, whose shifting policy seems to have been chiefly dominated by a regard for self; is the "Achitophel" of Dryden's great satire (1621-1683).

SHAFTESBURY, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, EARL OF, grandson of the preceding, philosopher, born in London; was an ardent student in his youth, made the grand tour, and entered Parliament in 1694, moving to the Upper House on the death of his father in 1699, where, as a staunch Whig, he gave steady support to William III.; withdrew from politics, never a congenial sphere to him, on the accession of Anne, and followed his bent for literature and philosophy; in 1711 his collected writings appeared under the title "Characteristics," in which he expounds, in the polite style of the 18th century, with much ingenuity and at times force, a somewhat uncritical optimism, enunciating, among other things, the doubtful maxim that ridicule is the test of truth (1671-1718).

SHAFTESBURY, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, 7TH EARL OF, statesman and philanthropist, born in London; was a distinguished graduate of Oxford, and entered Parliament as a Conservative in 1826, took office under Wellington in 1828, and was a lord of the Admiralty in Peel's ministry of 1834; succeeded to the earldom in 1851; but his name lives by virtue of his noble and lifelong philanthropy, which took shape in numerous Acts of Parliament, such as the Mines and Collieries Act (1842), excluding women and boys under 13 working in mines; the Better Treatment of Lunatics Act (1845), called the Magma Charta of the insane; the Factory Acts (1867); and the Workhouse Regulation Act (1878); while outside Parliament he wrought with rare devotion on behalf of countless benevolent and religious schemes of all sorts, notably the Ragged School movement and the better housing of the London poor; received the freedom of Edinburgh and London; was the friend and adviser of the Prince Consort and Queen Victoria (1801-1885).

SHAH (Pers. "King"), an abbreviation of Shah-in-Shah ("King of Kings"), the title by which the monarchs of Persia are known; it has also been used in Afghanistan and other Asiatic countries, but more generally the less assuming title of Khán is taken.

SHAH-JEHAN ("King of the World"), fifth of the Mogul emperors of Delhi; succeeded his father in 1627; a man of great administrative ability and a skilled warrior; conquered the Deccan and the kingdom of Golconda, and generally raised the Mogul Empire to its zenith; his court was truly Eastern in its sumptuous magnificence; the "Peacock Throne" alone cost £7,000,000; died in prison, a victim to the peridy of his usurping son Aurangzeb (1592-1660).

SHAKES, a fanciful sect founded by one Ann Lee, so called from their extravagant gestures in worship; they were agnostics and communists.

SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM, poet and dramatist, born in Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire; his father, John Shakespeare, a respected burgess of Stratford; his mother, Mary Arden, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer, through whom the family acquired some property; was at school at Stratford, married Anne Hathaway, a yeoman's daughter, at 18, she eight years older, and had by her three daughters; left for London somewhere between 1585 and 1587, in consequence, it is said, of a deer-stealing frolic on the estate of Sir Thomas Lucy of Charlecote; is said to have taken charge of horses at the theatre door, and by-and-by to have become an actor. His first poetical work, "Venus and Adonis," appeared in 1593, and "Lucrece" the year after; became connected with different theatres, and a shareholder in certain of them, in some of which he took part as actor, with the result, in a peculiar point of view, that he bought a house in his native place, where he chiefly resided for the ten years preceding his death. Of the poet's further history we know but a few facts; there is record of his having bought land near Stratford in 1602; a year later he figured in Burbage's company at the Blackfriars Theatre, London; there is record, too, of actions brought by him against certain people, mostly for debts; in 1613 he was purchasing more property in London; in 1616 he appended his signature to his will, dying about a month later from, it is alleged, the results of over-indulgence at a convivial meeting with Ben Jonson and Drayton; he was buried in the church at Stratford. As a poet Shakespeare's fame rests on his "Sonnets" (1609), and the many lyrics found in his plays, in addition to the poems mentioned above. Of his works as a whole, nothing can or need be said here; enough to add, as Carlyle says, "The best judgment, not of this country, but of Europe at large, is slowly pointing to the conclusion that he is the chief of all poets hitherto—the greatest intellect in our recorded world that has left record of himself in the way of literature. On the whole, I know not such a power of vision, such a faculty of thought, such a calmness of depth, placid, joyous strength, all things in that great soul of his so true and clear, as in a tranquil, unfathomable sea." Shakespeare's plays, with the order of their publication, are as follows: "Love's Labour's Lost," 1590; "Comedy of Errors," 1591; 1, 2, 3, "Henry VI.," 1590-1592; "Two Gentlemen of Verona," 1592-1593; "Midsummer Night's Dream," 1593-1594; "Richard III.," 1593; "Romeo and Juliet," 1591-1596 (?); "Richard II.," 1594; "King John," 1596; "Merchant of Venice," 1596; 1 and 2 "Henry IV.," 1597-1598; "Henry V.," 1599; "Taming of the Shrew," 1597 (?); "Merry Wives of Windsor," 1598; "Much Ado about Nothing," 1598; "As You Like It," 1599; "Twelfth Night," 1600-1601; "Julius Caesar," 1601; "All's Well," 1601-1602 (?); "Hamlet," 1602; "Measure for Measure," 1603; "Troilus and Cressida," 1603-1607 (?); "Othello," 1604; "Lea," 1605; "Macbeth," 1606; "Antony and Cleopatra," 1607; "Coriolanus," 1608; "Timon," 1608; "Pericles," 1608; "Cymbeline," 1609; "Tempest," 1610; "Winter's Tale," 1610-1611; "Henry VIII.," 1612-1613 (1564-1616).

SHALE, name given by geologists to clay which has been hardened and possesses a fissile structure.

SHALOTT, LADY OF, subject of a poem by Tennyson; was in love with Lancelot; wove a web which she must not rise from, otherwise a curse would fall on her; saw Lancelot pass one day, entered a boat and glided down to Camelot, but died on the way.

SHAMANISM, the religion of the native savage races of North Siberia and of the Eskimo of N. America, being a belief in spirits, both good and evil, who can be persuaded to bless or curse by the incantations of a priest called a Shaman.

SHAMMAL, an eminent Jewish rabbi of the time of Herod, who held the position of supreme judge in the Sanhedrin under the presidency of Hillel (q.v.), and whose narrow, rigid orthodoxy and repulsive policy became the leading principles of his school, "the House of Shammal," which, however, carried the system to a pitch of fanatical zeal not contemplated by its originator.

SHAMROCK, a small trefoil plant, the national emblem of Ireland; it is matter of dispute whether it is the wood-sorrel, a species of clover, or some other allied trefoil; the lesser yellow trefoil is perhaps the most commonly accepted symbol.

SHANYL, a great Caucasian chief, head of the Lezgians, who combined the functions of priest and warrior; consolidated the Caucasian tribes in their resistance to the Russians, and carried on a successful struggle in his mountain fastnesses for thirty years, till his forces were worn out and himself made captive in 1859 (1797-1871).

SHANGHAI, the chief commercial city and port of China, on the Wu-Sung river, an affluent of the Yang-tee-kiang, 12 m. from the coast, and 160 m. SE. of Nanking; large, densely peopled suburbs have grown round the closely packed and walled city, with its narrow, unclean streets; the French and English occupy the broad-streeted and well-built suburbs in the N.; the low-lying site exposes the city to great heat in the summer, and to frequent epidemics of cholera and fever; an extensive system of canals draws down a great part of the interior produce, and swells the export trade in tea, silk, cotton, rice, and sugar.

SHANNON, the first river of Ireland, rises in the Cullacagh Mountains, Co. Cavan; flows in a south-westerly direction through Loughs Allen, Ree, and Derg, besides forming several glough expansions, to Limerick, whence it turns due W., and opens out on the Atlantic in a wide estuary between Kerry (S.) and Clare (N.); has an entire course of 254 m., and is navigable to Lough Allen, a distance of 213 m.

SHANNON, JAMES JESUSA, painter, born in Auburn, New York State; after settling in England in 1878 became famous for his portraits, of which those of the Marchioness of Granby and Lady Henry Bentinck are best known; his "Flower Girl" was purchased under the Chantry bequest (1862-).

SHANS, or LAOS, the name of a Mongol people, descendants of aborigines of China, forming several large tribes scattered round the frontiers of Burma, Siam, and South China, whose territory, roughly speaking, extends N. as far as the Yunnan Plateau of South China; some are independent, but the bulk of the tribes are subject to Siam, China, and the British in Burma; practise slavery, are Buddhists in name, though still addicted to demon-worship, indolent, pleasure-loving, and for the most part peaceable and content; chased gold and silver work, rice, cotton, and tobacco are their chief products.

SEARON, a fertile region in Palestine of the maritime plain between Caesarea and Philistia, noted for its beauty and the fertility of its soil.

SEARP, ABRAHAM, a schoolmaster of Liverpool, and subsequent bookkeeper in London, whose wide knowledge of mathematics, astronomy, &c., attracted Flamsteed (q.r.), by whom he was invited in 1688 to enter the Greenwich Royal Observatory, where he did notable work, improving instruments, and showing great skill as a calculator; published "Geometry Improved," logarithmic tables, &c. (1651-1742).

SEARP, BECKY, an intriguing character in Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," very clever, but without heart.

SEARP, GRANVILLE, a noted abolitionist, born in Durham, trained for the bar, but accepted a post in the London Ordnance Office, which he held until the outbreak of the American War; was a voluminous writer on philology, law, theology, &c., but mainly devoted himself to the cause of negro emancipation, co-operating with Clarkson in founding the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery, and taking an active interest in the new colony for freedom in Sierra Leone, won a famous decision in the law-courts to the effect that whenever a slave set foot on English soil he became free; he was also one of the founders of the Bible Society (1735-1813).

SEARP, JAMES, archbishop of St. Andrews, born in Banff Castle; educated at Aberdeen University, visited England, where he formed important friendships, and in 1643 was appointed "regent" or professor of Philosophy at St. Andrews; a post he resigned five years later to become minister of Crail; during the Protectorate he sided with the "Resolutioners" or Moderates, and appeared before Cromwell in London to plead their cause; in 1660 received a commission to go to London to safeguard the interests of the Scottish Church, a trust he shamefully betrayed by intriguing with Charles at Breda, and with Clarendon and the magnates of the English Church to restore Prelacy in Scotland, he himself (by way of reward) being appointed archbishop of St. Andrews; henceforward he was but a pliant tool in the hands of his English employers, and an object of intense hatred to the Covenanters; in 1668 his life was attempted in Edinburgh by Robert Mitchell, a Covenanter preacher, and ultimately on Magnus Muir, May, 1679, he was mercifully hacked to pieces by a band of Covenanters headed by Hackston and John Ralston (1613-1679).

SEARP, WILLIAM, Scottish poet and man of letters, born in Paisley; started life in a bank, but turned to literature early; under his own name wrote many volumes of verse, biography, and criticism; from 1894 published many stories, poems, and dramas under the pseudonym of "Flona Macleod," among these being "Pharals," "The Sin-eater," "The Washer of the Ford," "The Divine Adventure," "The Immortal Hour," and "Deirdre" (1855-1905).

SEARLEY, FORBES WILMOT, British engineer; carried out important researches in connection with the properties of bakelite; professor at the School of Mines, Dhanbad, India (1897-).

SEASTER, a book containing the institutes of the Hindu religion or its legal requirements.

SEAW, GEORGE BERNARD, British author. The son of a civil servant, he was born in Dublin and educated there. At 16 he was placed in a land agent's office, but four years later he threw up his job and came to London, and after desultory attempts to enter business he began writing, and by 1883 had written five novels, but had had none of them published, and was earning money chiefly as a musician. In 1885 he became a reviewer for the Poll Mall Gazette; he also acted as art critic for the World and music critic for the Star. In 1892 "Widowers' Houses," his first play, appeared. Meanwhile he had joined the Fabian Society, and thrown himself actively into Socialist work. By the early years of this century he had produced "Arms and the Man," "Mrs. Warren's Profession," "The Doctor's Dilemma," "John Bull's Other Island," and a number of other plays, but his reputation for a long while rested with a small public. It was after the Great War that "St. Joan" established his popularity with the wider public and made his plays commercial successes. In 1929 came "The Apple Cart," a political satire on democracy. Besides some 40 plays Shaw has produced novels, essays such as "The Quintessence of Ibsenism," and political books like "The Common Sense of Municipal Trading," and "The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism." Dramatically the importance of Shaw is that he brought realism to a stage stifled by convention. Philosophically he has had much to say, but has covered his ideas with so much satiric jesting that his public do not always know when to take him seriously. His "Man and Superman" and "Back to Methusalem" contain most of his gospel, which is belied in a Life-force working through creative evolution, from which it follows that man must aim at producing something better than the human race as we know it, and must be rid of all sentiment (1856-).

SHAWNEES, a tribe of American Indians located originally in the eastern slopes of the Alleghanies, but now removed to Missouri, Kansas, and the Indian Territory.

SHEBA, believed to be a region in South Arabia, along the shore of the Red Sea.

SHECHINAH, a glory as of the Divine presence over the mercy-seat in the Jewish Tabernacle, and reflected from the winged cherubim which overshadowed it, the reality of which it is the symbol, being the Divine presence in man.

SHEEHAN, JOHN, art collector, born in Leeds, son of a manufacturer; presented to the nation in 1856 a collection of works by British artists, now housed in South Kensington Museum (1787-1863).

SHEERNESS, a fortified seaport and important garrison town with dockyards and naval arsenal in Kent, occupying the NW. corner of Sheppey Isle, where the Medway joins the Thames, 52 m. E. of London; is divided into Blue-town (within the garrison, and enclosing the 60 acres of docks), Mile-town, Banks-town, and Marina-town (noted for sea-bathing).

SHEFFIELD, a city of Yorkshire, and chief centre of the English cutlery trade, built on hilly ground on the Don near its confluence with the Sheaf, whence its name, 41 m. E. of Manchester; is a well-built town, with notable churches, public halls, theatres, &c., and well equipped with libraries, hospitals, parks, colleges, and various societies; does a vast trade in all forms of steel, iron, and brass goods, as well as plated and Britannia-metal articles; last century it greatly developed its manufactures of armour-plate, rails, and other heavier goods; its importance as a centre of cutlery dates from very early times, and the Cutlers' Company was founded there in 1624; has been from Saxon times the capital of the manor district of Hallamshire; it is divided into seven parliamentary districts, each of which sends a member to Parliament.

SHEFFIELD, JOHN, DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, son of the Earl of Mulgrave, whose title he succeeded to in 1668; served in the navy during the Dutch war of Charles II.; held office under James II., and was by William III. created Marquis of Northampton; a staunch Tory in Anne's reign, he was rewarded with a dukedom, lost office through opposing Marlborough, but was reinstated after 1710, and in George I.'s reign worked in the Stuart interest; wrote an "Essay on Poetry," among other literary productions (1648-1721).

SHEIKH, the chief of an Arab tribe; used often as a title of respect, Sheikh-ul-Islam being the ecclesiastical head of Mohammedans in Turkey.

SHEIL, RICHARD LALOR, Irish patriot, born in Tipperary; bred to the bar; gave himself for some time to literature; joined the Catholic Association; was distinguished for his oratory and his devotion, in conjunction with O'Connell, to Catholic emancipation; supported the Whig Government, and held office under Melbourne and Lord John Russell (1791-1861).

SHEKEL, among the ancient Hebrews originally a weight, and eventually the name of a coin of gold or silver, or money of a certain weight, the silver = 58. per oz., and the gold = 14.

SHELBURNE, WILLIAM PETTY, EARL OF, statesman, born in Dublin; succeeded to his father's title in 1761, a few weeks after his election to the House of Commons; held office in the ministries of Grenville (1763), of Chatham (1766), and of Rockingham (1782); his acceptance of the Premiership in 1782, after Rockingham's death, led to the resignation of Fox and the entry of William Pitt, at the age of 23, into the Cabinet; his short ministry (July, 1782, to February, 1783) saw the close of the Continental and American wars, and the concession of independence to the colonies, colluding shortly afterwards before the powerful coalition of Fox and North; in 1784, on his retirement from politics, was created Marquis of Lansdowne; was a Free-Trader, supporter of Catholic emancipation, and otherwise liberal in his views, but rather tactless in steering his way amid the troublous politics of his time (1737-1805).

SHELDONIAN THEATRE, "Senate House" of Oxford; so called from Gilbert Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury (1598-1669), who built it.

SHELLEY, MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT, author of "Frankenstein," daughter of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft, became the wife of the poet Shelley in 1816 after a two years' illicit relationship; besides "Frankenstein" (1822), wrote several romances, "The Last Man," "Lodore," and "Falkner," also "Rambles in Germany and Italy"; edited with valuable notes her husband's works (1797-1851).

SHELLEY, PERCY BYSSHE, born at Field Place, near Horsham, Sussex, eldest son of Sir Timothy Shelley, a wealthy landed proprietor; was educated at Eton, and in 1810 went to Oxford, where his impatience of control and violent heterodoxy of opinion, characteristic of him throughout, burst forth in a pamphlet, "The Necessity of Atheism," which led to his expulsion in 1811, together with Jefferson Hogg, his subsequent biographer; henceforth led a restless, wandering life; married at 19 Harriet Westbrook, a pretty girl of 16, a school companion of his sister, from whom he was separated within three years; under the influence of William Godwin (q.v.) his revolutionary ideas of politics and society developed apace; engaged in quixotic political enterprises in Dublin, Lynnmouth, and elsewhere, and above all put to practical test Godwin's heterodox views on marriage by eloping (1814) to the Continent with his daughter Mary, whom he married two years later after the unhappy suicide of Harriet, in 1816, embittered by Lord Byron's decision that he was unfit to be trusted with the care of Harriet's children, and with consumption threatening, he left England never to return; spent the few remaining years of his life in Italy, chiefly at Lucca, Florence, and Pisa, in friendly relations with Byron, Leigh Hunt, Trelawney, &c.; during this time were written his greatest works, "Prometheus Unbound," "The Cenci," his noble lament on Keats, "Adonais," besides other longer works, and most of his finest lyrics, "Ode to the West Wind," "The Skylark," &c.; was drowned while returning in an open sailing-boat from Leghorn to his home on Spezia Bay. Shelley is pre-eminently the poet of lyric emotion, the subtle and most musical interpreter of vague spiritual longing and intellectual desire; his poems form together "the most sensitive," says Stopford Brooke, "the most imaginative, and the most musical, but the least tangible, lyrical poetry we possess" (1792-1822).

SHELANDOAH, a river of Virginia, formed by two head-streams rising in Augusta Co., which unite 85 m. W. of Washington, and, flowing N.E. through the beautiful "Valley of Virginia," falls into the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, after a course of 170 m.; also the name of a town in Pennsylvania, 138 m. N.W. of Philadelphia; centre of an important coal district.

SHENSTONE, WILLIAM, poet, born, the son of a landed proprietor, in Halesowen, Worcestershire; was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, and during the years 1737-1742 produced three vols. of poetry, the most noted being "The Schoolmistress"; succeeded to his father's estate in 1745, and entered with much enthusiasm and reckless expenditure into landscape-gardening, which won him in his day a wider reputation than his poetry; his "Essays" have considerable critical merit and originality, while his poetry—ballads, odes, songs, &c.—has a music and grace despite its conventional diction (1714-1768).

SHEOL, the dark underworld or Hades of the Hebrews, inhabited by the shades of the dead.

SHEPHERD KINGS, or HYKSOS, a tribe of shepherds, alleged to have invaded Lower Egypt 2000 years before Christ, overthrown the reigning dynasty, and maintained their supremacy for 200 years.

SHEPHERD OF SALISBURY PLAIN, name of the hero, a shepherd of the name of Saunders, in a tract written by Hannah More, characterised by homely wisdom and simple piety.

SHEPPARD, REV. HUGH RICHARD LAWRIE, dean of Canterbury. A son of Canon Sheppard, he was educated at Marlborough and Cambridge, and became secretary to the Bishop of Stetney; in 1914 he served for a time as a chaplain in France, and the same year became vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, where he earned a nation-wide reputation for progressive methods; he resigned in 1927, was made a Companion of Honour, and in 1929 became dean of Canterbury (1883-).

SHEPPARD, JACK, a notorious criminal, whose audacious robberies and daring escapes from Newgate Prison made him for a time the terror and talk of London; drew some 200,000 people to witness his execution at Tyburn; figures as the hero of a well-known novel by Harrison Ainsworth (1792-1724).

SHEPPEY, ISLE OF, an islet in the estuary of the Thames, at the mouth of the Medway, belonging to Kent, from which it is separated by the Swale (spanned by a swing-bridge); great clay cliffs rise on the N., and, like the rest of the island, are rich in interesting fossil remains; corn is grown, and large flocks of sheep raised; chief town is Sheerness (q.v.), where the bulk of the people are gathered; is gradually diminishing before the encroaching sea.

SHERATON, THOMAS, a furniture maker who has given his name to a style of design; interested himself also in religious work, joining the Baptists (1751-1806).

SHERBORNE, an interesting old town of Dorsetshire, pleasantly situated on rising ground overlooking the sea, 118 m. S.W. of London; has one of the finest Perpendicular minsters in South England, ruins of an Elizabethan castle, and King Edward's School, re-founded in 1550 and ranking among the best of English public schools.

SHERBROOKE, ROBERT LOWE, VISCOUNT, statesman, born, the son of a rector, in Bingham, Nottingham; graduated at Oxford; obtained a Fellowship, and in 1836 was called to the bar; six years later emigrated to Australia; made his mark at the Sydney bar, taking at the same time an active part in the politics of the country; returned to England in 1850, and entered Parliament, holding office under Lord Aberdeen (1853) and Lord Palmerston (1855); education became his chief interest for some time, and in 1866 he fiercely opposed the Whig Reform Bill, but subsequently made amends to his party by his powerful support of Gladstone's Irish Church Disestablishment Bill, and was included in the Liberal ministry of 1868 as Chancellor of the Exchequer, a post he held till 1873, when he became Home Secretary; a man of great intellectual force and independence of judgment; created a viscount in 1880; was D.C.L. of Oxford and LL.D. of Edinburgh (1811-1892).

SHERE ALI, Ameer of Afghanistan, son and successor of Dost Mohammed, at first favoured by Britain.

but at last distrusted and driven from the throne (1823-1870).

SHERIDAN, PHILIP HENRY, a distinguished American general, born, of Irish parentage, in Albany, New York; obtained a cadetship at West Point Military Academy, and entered the army as a second-lieutenant in 1853; served in Texas and during the Civil War; won rapid promotion by his great dash and skill as commander of a cavalry regiment; gained wide repute by his daring raids into the S.; cleared the Confederates out of the Shenandoah Valley in 1864, and by his famous ride (October 19, 1864), from Winchester to Cedar Creek snatched victory out of defeat, routing the conjoined forces of Early and Lee; received the thanks of Congress, and was created major-general; took an active part under Grant in compelling the surrender of Lee, and in bringing the war to a close; subsequently during Grant's presidency was promoted to lieutenant-general; visited Europe in 1870 to witness the Franco-German War, and in 1883 succeeded Sherman as general-in-chief of the American army (1831-1888).

SHERIDAN, RICHARD BRINSLEY BUTLER, dramatist and politician, born in Dublin; educated at Harrow; was already committed to literature when, in 1773, he settled down in London with his gifted young wife, Elizabeth Linley, the singer, and scored his first success with "The Rivals" in 1775, following it up with the overrated "Duenna"; aided by his father-in-law became owner of Drury Lane Theatre, which somewhat lagged till the production of his most brilliant satirical comedy, "The School for Scandal" (1777), and the "critic" set flowing the tide of prosperity, turning his attention next to politics he entered Parliament under Fox's patronage in 1780, and two years later became Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Rockingham's ministry; his great speech (1787) impeaching Hastings for his treatment of the Begums placed him in the front rank of orators, but although he sat for 32 years in Parliament, only once again did he reach the same height of eloquence, in a speech (1794) supporting the French Revolution, and generally failed to establish himself as a reliable statesman; meanwhile his theatrical venture had ended disastrously, and financial troubles thickened around him until his death; he was accorded a burial in Westminster Abbey (1751-1816).

SHERIF, or SHEREEF, a title of dignity among Mohammedans of either sex bestowed upon descendants of the Prophet through his daughter Fatima and her husband Ali; as a distinguishing badge women wear a green veil, and men a green turban.

SHERIFF, in England the chief officer of the Crown in every county, appointed annually, and intrusted with the execution of the laws and the maintenance of peace and order, with power to summon the posse comitatus. The office originated in Anglo-Saxon times, when it exercised wide judicial functions which have been gradually curtailed, and such duties as remain—the execution of writs, enforcement of legal decisions, &c., are mostly delegated to an under-sheriff (usually a lawyer) and bound-bailiffs, while the sheriff himself, generally a person of wealth (the office being unsalaried and compulsory, but not necessarily for more than one year) discharges merely honorary duties. In Scotland the sheriff, or sheriff-principal, as he is called, is the chief judge of the county, and has under him one or more sheriff-substitutes, who are advocates or law agents of several years' standing, and upon whom devolves the larger portion of the important and multifarious duties of his office. In America the sheriff is the chief administrative officer of the county, but exercises no judicial functions at all.

SHERIFFMUIR, a barren spot stretching N. of the Ochils, in Perthshire, 5 m. N.E. of Birlinn; was the scene of an indecisive conflict between 9000 Jacobites under the Earl of Mar and 3500 Royalists under the Duke of Argyll, November 13, 1715.

SIBERIA, a vast Russian territory in North Asia (one and a third times the size of Europe), stretching from the Ural Mountains (W.) to the seas of Behring, Okhotsk, and Japan (E.), bounded on the N. by the Arctic Ocean and on the S. by China and the Central Asiatic provinces of Russia; forms in the main an immense plain, sloping from the Altai and other mountain ranges on the S. to the dreary, ice-bound littoral on the N., drained by the northward-flowing Obi, Irtysh, Yenesei, Lena, &c., embracing every kind of soil, from the fertile, grain-growing plains of the S. and rich grazing steppe-land of the W. to the forest tracts and bogland of the N., and experiencing a variety of climates, but for the most part severely cold; hunting, fishing, and mining are the chief industries, with agriculture and stock-raising in the S. and W. The great Trans-Siberian Railway, started in 1891, opened up the country, which is divided into eight "governments," the chief towns being Tomsk, Irkutsk, Omak, and Tobolsk; three-fifths of the population are Russians, chiefly exiles and descendants of exiles. Russian advance in Asia against the Tartars was begun in 1850, and was carried on by warlike Cossack marauders, followed by hunters, droves of escaping serfs, and persecuted religious sects.

SIBYL, the name given to a woman, or rather to a number of women, much fabled in antiquity, regarded by Ruskin as representing the voice of God in nature, and, as such, endowed with visionary prophetic power, or what in the Highlands of Scotland is called "second-sight"; the most famous of the class being the Sibyl of Cumae, who offered King Tarquin of Rome nine books for sale, which he refused on account of the exorbitant sum asked for them, and again refused after she had burnt three of them, but in the end paid what was originally asked for the three remaining, which he found to contain oracular utterances bearing on the worship of the gods and the policy of Rome. These, after being entrusted to keepers, were afterwards burned, and the contents replaced by a commission appointed to collect them in the countries around, to share the same fate as the original collection. The name is applied in medieval times to figures representative of the prophets who foretold the coming of Christ; the prophets so represented were reckoned sometimes 10, sometimes 12 in number; they are, says Fairholt, "of tall stature, full of vigour and moral energy; the costume rich but conventional, ornamented with pearls and precious stones."

SICILIAN VESPER, the name given to a massacre of the French in Sicily at the hour of vespers on the eve of Easter Monday in 1282, the signal for the commencement being the first stroke of the vesper bell; the massacre included men and women and children to the number of 8000 souls, and was followed by others throughout the island.

SICILY, the largest island in the Mediterranean, lying off the SW. extremity of Italy, to which it belongs, and from which it is separated by the narrow strait of Messina, 2 m. broad; the three extremities of the triangular configuration form (Cape Faro (N.E.), Capo di S. and Capo di W.); its mountainous interior culminates in the volcanic Etna, and numerous streams rush swiftly down the thickly wooded valleys; the coast-lands are exceptionally fertile, growing (although agricultural methods are extremely primitive) excellent crops of wheat and barley, as well as an abundance of fruit; sulphur-mining is an important industry, and large quantities of the mineral are exported, enjoys a fine, equable climate, but malaria is in parts endemic; the inhabitants are a mixed—Greek, Italian, and Arabic,—race, and differ considerably in language and appearance from Italians proper; are ill-governed, and as a consequence discontented and backward, even brigandage not yet being entirely suppressed. Palermo, the largest city, is situated on the precipitous N. coast. As part of the "Kingdom of the Two Sicilies," comprising Sicily and Naples, it was overrun by Garibaldi in 1860, and in the same year was incorporated with the kingdom of Italy.

SMART, CHRISTOPHER, English poet, born in Kent; was a Fellow of Cambridge and a friend of Johnson; author of the "Song to David", he was subject to insanity, and it was written during lucid intervals; was the author of a prose translation of Horace (1722-1771).

SMEATON, JOHN, civil engineer, born near Leeds; began life as a mathematical instrument maker; made improvements in mill-work, and gained the Copley Medal in 1758; visited the principal engineering works in Holland and Belgium; was entrusted with the rebuilding of Eddystone Lighthouse (q.v.) after it was in 1755 burnt down, which he finished in 1759; did other engineering work in the construction of canals, harbours, and mills, rising to the summit of his profession (1724-1792).

SMECTYMNUS, a pamphlet written in 1641, the title of which is made up of the initial letters of the names of the authors, Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcannon, William Sparrow, Nonconformist ministers, who attacked Bishop Hall's defence of Episcopacy.

SMEEDLEY, FRANK, British novelist. His works, though of little lasting merit, had a great popularity in the middle of the 19th century: "Harry Coverdale's Courtesan" and "Lewis Arundel" were among his works, which were illustrated by "Philz" and Cruckshank (1818-1864).

SMELFUNGUS, a name given by Sterne to Smollett as author of a volume of "Travels through France and Italy," for the snarling abuse he heaps on the institutions and customs of the countries he visited; a name Carlyle assumes when he has any seriously severe criticisms to offer on things particularly that have gone or are going to the bad.

SMILES, SAMUEL, Scottish author, born in Haddington; was bred to medicine, and professed it for a time, but abandoned it for literary and other work; wrote the "Life of George Stephenson" in 1857, with other biographies, followed by "Self-Help" two years after (1812-1904).

SMITH, ADAM, political economist, born in Kirkcaldy, Fife; studied at Glasgow and Oxford, went to Edinburgh and became acquainted with David Hume and his compères; was appointed to the chair of Logic in Glasgow in 1751, and the year after to that of Moral Philosophy; produced in 1759 his "Theory of Moral Sentiments," visited Paris with the young Duke of Buccleuch, got acquainted with Queensy, D'Alembert, and Necker, and returning in 1766, settled in his native place under a pension from the Duke of Buccleuch, where in 1776 he produced his "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," a work to which he devoted 10 years of his life, and which has had a world-wide influence. In 1778 he settled in Edinburgh as Commissioner of Customs for Scotland, and in 1787 was elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University (1783-1790).

SMITH, ALEXANDER, poet, born in Kilmarnock; began life as a pattern-designer, contributed to the Glasgow Citizen, wrote a volume of poems, "A Life Drama," and produced other works in a style characterised as "epasmodic" by Professor Aytoun; is best known, perhaps, by "Dreamthorpe," a book of essays (1830-1867).

SMITH, GEORGE, Assyriologist, born in London; trained as a bank-note engraver, but attracted the attention of Sir Henry Rawlinson by his interest in cuneiform inscriptions, and in 1867 received an appointment in the British Museum; acquired great skill as an interpreter of Assyrian inscriptions, published "Annals of Assurbanipal," and in 1872 discovered a tablet with the "Chaldean Account of the Deluge"; carried through important expeditions (1871, 1873, 1876) in search of antiquities in Nineveh and other parts of Assyria, accounts of which he published; wrote also histories of Babylonia, Assyria, Sennacherib, &c. (1840-1876).

SMITH, GOLDWIN, English man of letters, born in Reading; was at one time intimately associated with Oxford University, went to America and became professor of English History in Cornell University, and settled in Canada; wrote a number of books and pamphlets, one on the "Relations between England and America" and another on "The Political Destiny of Canada"; he was an ultra-liberal (1823-1910).

SMITH, JAMES and HORACE, authors of the famous parodies "The Rejected Addresses," born in London; James, in business as a solicitor, and Horace, a wealthy stockbroker; both were occasional contributors to the periodical press before the public offer of a prize for the best poetical address to be spoken at the re-opening of Drury Lane Theatre prompted them to issue a series of "Rejected Addresses," parodying the popular writers of the day—Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Scott, Byron, &c.; intensely clever, these parodies have never been surpassed in their kind; Horace was also a busy writer of novels now forgotten, and published two vols. of poetry; James subsequently wrote a number of Charles Mathews' "Entertainments" (James, 1776-1839; Horace, 1770-1849).

SMITH, JOHN, Cambridge Platonist, born in Northamptonshire; left "Select Discourses," giving signs both of spiritual insight and vigour of thinking (1618-1652).

SMITH, JOHN, soldier, born in Lincolnshire; had a life of adventure and peril in Europe; in 1806 he became a leader of the English colonists of Virginia; established friendly relations with the Indians, returned to this country twice over, and introduced Pocahontas (q.v.) to the Queen; gave the name of New England to the eastern American coast and endeavoured to establish the fisheries; spent his later years in writing pamphlets, in which he advocated the further settlement and development of the colony, exhibiting the true Empire spirit in his provision (1580-1631).

SMITH, RT. REV. JOHN TAYLOR, British bishop. Ordained in 1886, he served in Sierra Leone, and in 1897 became its bishop; he was made chaplain-general to the forces in 1901, and held the post till 1925, when he retired and threw himself into evangelical work, notably with the Children's Special Service Mission, the Crusaders Union, and the Scripture Union (1860-).

SMITH, JOSEPH, founder of the Latter Day Saints or Mormons. The son of an American farmer, he claimed to be a Divine medium; though the founder of Mormonism, he was not a polygamist; he was murdered in 1844, a fact which helped the growth of the movement (1805-1844).

SMITH, SYDNEY, political writer and wit, born in Woodford, Essex, of partly English and partly Huguenot blood; educated at Westminster and Oxford, bred for the Church; after a brief curacy in Whitshire settled in Edinburgh from 1798 to 1803, where, while officiating as a clergyman, he became one of the famous editors of the Edinburgh Review, and a contributor; settled for a time afterwards in London, where he delivered a series of admirable lectures on ethics, till he was appointed to a small living in Yorkshire, and afterwards to a richer living in Somerset, and finally a canonry in St. Paul's; his writings, deal with abuses of the period, and are, except his lectures perhaps, all out of date now (1771-1846).

SMITH, SIR WILLIAM, classical and Biblical scholar, born in London; distinguished himself at the university there and took a course of law at Gray's Inn, but followed his bent for scholarship, and in 1840-1842 issued his great "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," following it up with the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology" and the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography"; did eminent service to the cause of education by a series of popular editions of Greek and Latin texts, school grammars, dictionaries, &c.; not less valuable is his "Dictionary of the Bible"; was editor of the Quarterly Review from 1867, and in 1892 received a knighthood (1813-1898).

SMITH, WILLIAM HENRY, British newsgate and politician, the pioneer of railway station book-stalls. In politics a Conservative, he was successively 1st Lord of the Admiralty, Secretary for War, Irish Secretary, and leader of the Conservative Party in the House of Commons; his wife was created Viscountess Hambleden after his death (1825-1891).

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Biblical scholar and critic, born in Kelso, Aberdeenshire; educated for the Scottish Free Church, became professor of Hebrew in the connection at Aberdeen; was prosecuted for heresy in the matter of the origin of the books of the Old Testament, and finally removed from the chair; became joint-editor of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica," and finally professor of Arabic at Cambridge; he was a man of versatile ability, extensive scholarship, keen critical acumen, and he contributed not a little to vindicate the claims of the scholar in regard to the Bible (1846-1894).

SMITH, SIR WILLIAM SIDNEY, British admiral, born in Westminster; entered the navy at 12, became a captain after many gallant services at 18, was naval adviser to the king of Sweden and knighted, joined Lord Hood off Toulon and helped to burn the French fleet; was taken prisoner by the French in 1796, and after two years made his escape; forced Napoleon to raise the siege of Acre, and was wounded at Aboukir; was rewarded with a pension of £1000, and raised in the end to the rank of admiral (1764-1840).

SMITH-DORRIEN, SIR HORACE LOCKWOOD, British general. Joining the Infantry in 1876, he saw service in the Zulu War, Egypt, the Sudan, Tirah, and Chitral, and commanded a division in the Boer War. In the Great War he led the 2nd Corps in the retreat from Mons, but after 1915 had to retire on health grounds, in 1918 he became governor of Gibraltar (1858-1930).

SMITHFIELD, or SMOOTHFIELD, an open space of ground in London, N. of Newgate, long famous for its live-stock markets; in olden times lay outside the city walls, and was used as a place of recreation and of executions; the scene of William Wallace's execution and the death of Wat Tyler; gradually surrounded by the encroaching city, the cattle-market became a nuisance, and was abolished in 1855; is now London's meat market.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, a celebrated American institution "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," in Washington; founded and endowed by James Madsen Smithson, a natural son of the Duke of Northumberland, a zealous chemist and mineralogist, after having had a paper rejected by the Royal Society, of which he was a Fellow. The building is one of the finest in the capital; is under government control and the President of the United States is ex officio the head of the institution; encourages scientific research, administers various funds, and directs expeditions for scientific purposes.

SMOLENSK, an ancient town of Russia, and capital of a government of the same name, on the Dnieper, 244 m. SW. of Moscow; is surrounded by walls; has a fine cathedral, and is strongly fortified; carries on a good grain trade; here in 1812 Napoleon defeated the Russians under Barclay de Tolly and Barratton on his march to Moscow in August, 1812.

SMOLLETT, TOBIAS GEORGE, novelist, born in Dalquhurn, Dumfriesshire, of good family; bred to medicine, but drifted to literature, in prosecution of which he set out to London at the age of 18; his first effort was a failure; he took an appointment as a surgeon's mate on board a warship in 1746, which landed him for a time in the West Indies; on his return to England in 1748 achieved his first success in "Roderick Random," which was followed by "Peregrine Pickle" in 1751, "Count Fathom" in 1753, and "Humphrey Clinker" in 1771, added to which he wrote a "History of England," and a political lampoon, "The Adventures of an Atom"; his novels have no plot, but "in inventive tale-telling and in cynical characterisation he is not easily equalled" (1721-1771).

SMUTTI, in the Hindu religion the name given to traditional usage, as opposed to Smriti, or revelation, from which proceeded, at a later date, the body of laws, such as that of Manu, in which the morality prescribed is "sound, solid, and practical."

SMUTS, JAN CHRISTIAN, South African general and politician. During the South African War he led the Boer forces in Cape Colony against Britain and met with several successes; after the war he served under Botha as Finance Minister. In the Great War he took charge of the British forces in German East Africa, and in 1917 became South Africa's representative in the Imperial War Cabinet. He was Premier of South Africa from 1919 to 1924, in which year he was defeated by General Hertzog (1870-).

SMYRNA, a town of great antiquity, since ancient times the chief port of Asia Minor; is situated amid surrounding hills at the head of the Gulf of Smyrna, an arm of the Egean Sea; has no imposing structures, and is, especially in the Turkish quarter, ill-drained and crowded; is the seat of the Turkish Governor-General of the province, of archbishops, Roman Catholic, Greek, and Armenian; manufactures embrace carpets, pottery, cottons and woollens; a splendid harbour favours a large import and export trade; for long a possession of Greece and then of Rome, it finally fell into the hands of the Turks in 1424. The Treaty of Sevres in 1920 mandated it to Greece, but in 1922 Turkish forces under Mustafa Kemal (g.c.) seized the town and burnt it.

SOCIAL WAR, name given to an insurrection of the allied States in Italy against the domination of Rome, which lasted from 90 to 88 B.C., in consequence of their exclusion from the rights of citizenship and the privileges attached; they formed a league to assert their rights, which ended in defeat.

SOCIALISM, a social system which, in opposition to the competitive system that prevails at present, seeks to reorganise society on the basis, in the main, of community of interest and co-operation in labour for the common good, agreeably to the democratic spirit of the time and the changes required by the rise of individualism and the decay of feudalism. It advocates the national ownership of the means of production, distribution, and exchange, a policy advanced in English politics by the Labour Party.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE, a society founded in 1698 which during the last 200 years has originated and supported a number of agencies, both in this country and abroad, for propagating Christian knowledge; distributed into a number of separate departments.

SOCIETY ISLANDS, an archipelago in the South Pacific, consisting of 13 principal islands and numerous islets, the chief being Tahiti; they are mountainous, and encircled by belts of flat land as well as coral reefs; have a fertile soil and luxuriant vegetation, while the climate is healthy though enervating; the Polynesian inhabitants are intelligent but indolent, and the land is worked by immigrant races; production of copra, sugar, and rum are chief industries; named in honour of the Royal Society by Cook, their discoverer.

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, commonly called Quakers, a religious sect founded in the middle of the 17th century, George Fox (g.c.) being one of the founders; the sect was much persecuted in its early days, and in consequence grew in numbers and influence; silence plays a large part in their meetings, and they have no sacraments; they are opposed to war, and have supplied leaders for all kinds of philanthropic work; Friends' House, Euston Road, London, is the headquarters of the society.

SOCIETY OF JESUS, the Jesuit order founded by Ignatius Loyola (q.v.).

SOCINIANS, a sect of the Unitarian body who, in the 16th century, took their name from Faustus Socinus (q.v.), and who, besides denying the doctrine of the Trinity, deny the divinity of Christ and the divine inspiration of Scripture; they arose into importance originally in Poland, and in the 17th century spread by degrees in Prussia, the Netherlands, and England.

SOCINUS, FAUSTUS, a theologian, born in Italy; one of the founders of Socinianism; for his views had to exile himself for years, and was much persecuted for his opinions; in Cracow, where he dwelt for a time, he was by a mob dragged from a sick-bed half-naked along the street, had his house robbed and his papers burned (1539-1604).

SOCIOLOGY, the science which treats of the nature and the developments of society and of social institutions; a science to which Herbert Spencer, in succession to Comte, contributed more than any other scientist, deducing, as he does, a series of generalizations by comparison of individual organisms with social.

SOCOTRA, an island off the E. coast of Africa, 148 m. N.E. of Cape Guardafui, over 70 m. long and 20 m. broad; it is mountainous, surrounded by a margin of plain land from 2 to 4 m. broad; is comparatively barren; is inhabited by Mohammedans, who rear sheep, goats, and cattle; exports dates, aloes, hides, and pearls; the sultan is a feudatory of Britain.

SOCRATES, Athenian philosopher, pronounced by the Delphic oracle the wisest of men; was the son of Sophroniscus, a staturary, and Phænarete, a midwife; was brought up to his father's profession, in which it would seem he gave promise of success; he lived all his days in Athens, and gathered about him as his pupils all the ingenious youth of the city; he wrote no book, propounded no system, and founded no school; he was ever abroad in the thoroughfares in all weather talking to whom would listen, and instilling into all and sundry a love of justice and truth; of quacks and pretenders he was the sworn foe, and he cared not what enmity he provoked if he could persuade one and another to think and do what was right; "he was so pious," says Xenophon in his "Memorabilia," "that he did nothing without the sanction of the gods; so just, that he never wronged any one, even in the least degree; so much master of himself, that he never preferred the agreeable to the good; so wise, that in deciding on the better and the worse he never faltered; in short, he was the best and happiest man that could possibly exist"; he failed not to incur enmity, and his enemies persecuted him to death; charged with not believing in the State religion, with introducing new gods, and corrupting youth, he was convicted by a majority of his judges and condemned to die; thirty days elapsed between the passing of the sentence and its execution, during which period he held converse with his friends and talked of the immortality of the soul; to an offer of escape he turned a deaf ear, drank the hemlock potion prepared for him with perfect composure, and died (469-399 B.C.). See XANTIPPE.

SOCRATES, Church historian of the 4th century, born at Byzantium; bred to the bar; his "Ecclesiastical History" embraces a period from 306 to 439, a work of no great merit.

SOCRATES, APOLOGY OF, a work of Plato, being a speech put into the mouth of Socrates before the Areopagus (q.v.) in his defence in answer to the charge brought against him, the same having been written by Plato after the philosopher's death.

SODDY, SIR FREDERICK, British scientist, professor of Chemistry at Aberdeen, 1914-1919; appointed Lee's professor of Chemistry at Oxford in 1914; he carried out many researches in physical chemistry, his greatest work being in connection with radioactivity, for which he was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1921; published books on radioactivity and the structure of the atom, and wrote also on economic subjects (1877-).

SODIUM, one of the alkali metals, similar in its chemical properties to potassium and lithium; it attacks water, with the evolution of hydrogen; its hydroxide, or the solution of its oxide in water, is known as caustic soda; many of its salts are of practical importance, e.g. the carbonate (washing soda), the chloride (common salt), and the bicarbonate.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH, two ancient cities which for their wickedness were, as the Bible relates, consumed with fire from heaven; they are supposed to have stood near the S. border of the Dead Sea, though they were not, as was at one time supposed, submerged in the waters of it.

SOFALA, a Portuguese maritime district of South-East Africa, stretching from the Zambezi R. to Delagoa Bay, and forming the S. portion of the colony of Mozambique. Sofala, chief port on a bay of the same name, is a place of little importance.

SOPHIA, ST., the personification of the Divine wisdom, to whom, as to a saint, many churches have been dedicated, especially the Church of Constantinople.

SOPHISTS, according to tradition, a sect of thinkers that arose in Greece, and whose radical principle it was that we have only a subjective knowledge of things, and that we have no knowledge at all of objective reality, that things are as they seem to us, and that we have no knowledge of what they are in themselves; "on this field," says Schwegler, "they disported, enjoying with boyish exuberance the exercise of the power of subjectivity, and destroying, by means of a subjective dialectic, all that had been ever objectively established," such as "the laws of the State, inherited custom, religious tradition, and popular belief. . . . They form, in short, the German Aufklärung, the Greek Illumination. They acknowledged only private judgment and ignored the existence of a judgment that is not private and has absolute rights irrespective of the sentiments of the individual." Later authorities, including Grote, discredit this view, maintaining that the sophists did not constitute a sect and propounded no exact philosophical doctrine, but were merely teachers and lecturers in culture and oratory.

SOPHOCLES, Athenian tragic poet, born in Colonus, a suburb of Athens; when but 16, such was his musical talent, he was selected to lead the choir that sang the song of triumph over the victory of Salamis; his first appearance as a dramatist was in 488 B.C., when he had Æschylus as his rival and won the prize, though he was seven years afterwards defeated by Euripides, but retrieved the defeat the year following by the production of his "Antigone." That same year one of the 10 strategoi (or generals) and he accompanied Pericles in his war against the aristocrats of Samos. He wrote a number of dramas, over 100 it is alleged, but only 7 survive, and these in probable order are "Ajax," "Antigone," "Electra," "Oedipus Tyrannus," "Trachiniae," "Oedipus Coloneus," and "Philoctetes." Thus are all his subjects drawn from Greek legend, and they are all alike remarkable for the intense humanity and sublime passion that inspires them and the humane and the high and holy resolves they stir up (497-405 B.C.).

SOPWITZ, THOMAS OCTAVE MURDOGH, British aeronaut. He first became known in 1910, when he won a prize for a Channel flight, and the following year he started an aviation works at Kingston, where he made the machines named after him, which were used with excellent results in the Great War (1888-).

SORATA, a volcanic peak in the Bolivian Andes, 21,470 ft. in height.

SORBONNE, a celebrated college of Paris, taking its name from its founder, Robert of Sorbon, chaplain to Saint Louis in the 13th century; was exclusively devoted to theology, and through the rigour of its discipline and learning of its professors soon exercised a predominant influence on the theological thought of Europe, which it maintained until the new learning of the Renaissance (16th century), together with its own dogmatic conservatism, left it hopelessly stuck in the "Sorbonnian bog" of desiccated scholastic theology; became an object of satiric attacks by Boileau, Voltaire, and others, and was suppressed in 1789 at the outburst of the Revolution; was revived by Napoleon in 1808; is at present the seat of the Académie Universitaire de Paris, with faculties of theology, science, and literature.

SORDELLO, a Provençal poet of the 13th century, whom Dante and Virgil met in Purgatory sitting solitary and with a noble, haughty mien, but who sprang up at sight of Virgil and embraced him and accompanied him a part of his way; Browning used his name as the title of a poem showing the conflict a minstrel experiences in perfecting his craft.

SOREL, AGNES. See AGNES SOREL.

SOREL, ALBERT. French historian. Educated in Paris and Germany, he became a civil servant, but spent much of his spare time in literary work; his chief works were "The French Revolution" and "Europe" (1849-1906).

SORROW, SANCTUARY OF. Goethe's name for the fold of Christ, wherein, according to His promise (Matt. v. 4), the mourners "who might gather together there would find relief and be comforted, the path of sorrow leading up to the 'porch' of the sanctuary."

BORROWS OF THE VIRGIN. See SEVEN DOLOURS.

BORROWS OF WERTHER. A work by Goethe and one of his earliest, the production of which constituted a new era in the life of the poet, and marks a new era in the literature of Europe, "as giving expression to a class of feelings deeply important to modern minds, but for which our older poetry offered no exponent, and perhaps could offer none, because they are feelings that arise from passion incapable of being converted into action, and belong to an ignorant, uncultivated, and unbelieving age such as ours," feelings that Byronically: "in dark wayward mood, reflect a mere sense of the misery of human life."

BORTES VIRGILLIANÆ. consulting the pages of Virgil to ascertain one's fortune, by opening the book at random, putting the finger on a passage, and taking that for the oracle of fate of which one is in quest.

BOSTRATUS, architect of the Pharos of Alexandria, lived in the 3rd century B.C., and was patronized by Ptolemy Philadelphus.

BOTHERN, EDWARD ASKEW, comedian, born in Liverpool; at 23 went on the stage, and for some time was a member of the stock company of the Theatre Royal, Birmingham; afterwards acted in America, and made his mark in Tom Taylor's "Our American Cousin" (1858) in the small part of Lord Dundreary, which he gradually developed into an elaborate and phenomenally successful caricature of an English peer, and in which he appeared thousands of times in America and England, scored a great success also as David Garrick in Robertson's well-known comedy (1826-1881).

BOUBISE, DUC DE. French soldier; served first under Prince Maurice of Orange, and commanded the Huguenots against Louis XIII., but after some successes was compelled to take refuge in England; distinguished himself at the defence of Rochelle, but was defeated again and had to betake himself to England as before, where he died (1583-1642).

BOUBISE, PRINCE DE, marshal of France; was aide-de-camp to Louis XV. in Flanders, was favoured by Pompadour, held an important command in the Seven Years' War, but was defeated by Frederick the Great at Rossbach (1715-1787).

SOUDAN, or SUDAN, the cradle of the negro race, a vast tract of territory stretching E and W. across the African continent from the Atlantic (W.) to the Red Sea and Highlands of Abyssinia (E.), between the Sahara (W.) and the Gulf of Guinea and the central equatorial provinces (E.); divided into (a) Upper Soudan, embracing Senegambia, Sierra Leone, Ashanti, Dahomey, Liberia, and west coast-lands; (b) Lower Soudan, including the Fula States, Massina, Gando, Sokoto, &c.; (c) Egyptian Soudan, which in 1882 was subdivided into (1) West Soudan, including Dar-Fur, Kordofan, Bahr-el-Ghazal, and Dongola; (2) Central Soudan, comprising Khartoum, Sennar, Berber, Fashoda, and the Equatorial Provinces, &c.; (3) Eastern Soudan, bordering on the Red Sea, and embracing Taka, Suakin, and Massowah; (4) Harar, stretching E. of Abyssinia. The extension of Egyptian rule into this territory began in 1819 with the capture of Khartoum, which became the base of military operations, ending in the gradual conquest of the surrounding regions in 1874. A serious revolt, fanned by religious fanaticism, broke out in 1882, and, headed by the Mahdi (q.v.) and his lieutenant Osman Digna, ended in the utter rout of the Egyptian forces under Hicks Pasha and Baker Pasha; Gordon, after a vain attempt to relieve him, perished in Khartoum; but Stanley was more successful in relieving Emin Bey in the Equatorial Province. Anarchy and despotism ensued until the victorious campaign of Kitchener (q.v.) again restored the lost provinces to Egypt under British protection. In 1899 an agreement was made between Great Britain and Egypt establishing the joint sovereignty of the two States in the Soudan, and in 1922, when Egypt was granted independence, the status quo in the Soudan was retained.

SOULT, NICOLAS-JEAN DE DIEU, duke of Dalmatia and marshal of France, born in St. Aniane-la-Baptiste, department of Tarn; enlisted as a private in 1785, and by 1794 was general of a brigade; gallant conduct in Swiss and Italian campaigns under Massena won him rapid promotion, and in 1804 he was created a marshal, served with the emperor in Germany, and led the deciding charge at Austerlitz, and for his services in connection with the Treaty of Tilsit received the title of Duc de Dalmatia; at the head of the French army in Spain he outmanoeuvred the English in 1808, conquered Portugal, and opposed to Wellington a skill and tenacity not less than his own, but was thwarted in his efforts by the obstinate incompetence of Joseph Bonaparte; turned Royalist after the abdication of Napoleon, but on his return from Elba rallied to the emperor's standard, and fought at Waterloo; was subsequently banished, but restored in 1819; became active in the public service, and was honoured as ambassador in England in 1838; retired in 1847 with the honorary title of "Marshal-General of France" (1769-1851).

SOUND, THE, a strait 50 m. long, between Sweden and Denmark, which connects the Cattegat with the Baltic Sea; dues at one time levied on ships passing through the channel were abolished in 1857, and over three millions paid in compensation, Britain contributing one-third and undertaking to superintend the navigation and maintain the lighthouses.

SOUTH, ROBERT, an English divine, born in Hackney; obtained several preferments in the Church, but refused a bishopric; was distinguished for his hostility to the Dissenters, and was never tired of heaping ridicule on them and their principles; wrote a book in defence of the Trinity which involved him in a furious controversy with Dr. Sherlock. (1634-1716)

SOUTH AFRICA, THE UNION OF. British dominion, extends from the Cape of Good Hope to the River Limpopo, with a total area of 794,500 sq. m. The Orange, the Vaal, and the Limpopo are the chief rivers, and Table Mountain, the Bergens, Drakensbergen, Nieuweveld, & Aggeveld, and Sneeuwbergen are the principal mountains. Originally discovered by Bartholomew Diaz, a Portuguese, in 1486, the Cape of Good Hope was visited eleven years later by Vasco da Gama. It was nearly 200 years later that the Dutch and the English began to settle, and in 1814 the Cape became a British colony, as did Natal in 1843. The Transvaal and Orange Free State were colonized by Dutch Boers (q.v.), and at the end of last century there was a clash with Britain that resulted in the Boer War (q.v.) and the ultimate establishment of the Union of South Africa as a British Dominion. Dominion status dates from 1909. The Union comprises Cape Province, Natal, the Orange Free State, and the Transvaal, and is governed by a Governor-General, an executive council, and two Houses of Parliament, which meet at Cape Town, though Pretoria is the seat of government. In addition, each province has its own Provincial Council. Agriculture is the main occupation of the people, wheat and fruit growing being the chief industries, though the tobacco crop increases yearly. Industries of all kinds are encouraged, and attempts are made to stimulate home production of iron and steel. Gold mining is the main source of wealth, and diamonds, silver, copper, and tin are also mined. There are good railway and telegraph communications.

SOUTH AFRICAN COMPANY, THE BRITISH, a chartered company founded by Cecil Rhodes in 1889 to administer Rhodesia. Besides supervising trade it was responsible for governing the district, and it also rented land to settlers. When the charter expired in 1923 Rhodesia was granted responsible self-government under a governor.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA, third largest of the provinces of Australia, stretches N. and S. in a broad band through the heart of the continent from the Southern Ocean to the Northern Territory, having Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria on the E., Western Australia on the W., and the Northern Territory on the N. Until 1926 it included the last-named, which was then constituted a separate Territory subdivided into North Australia and Central Australia. (q.v.). South Australia begins about 26° S. latitude, and is traversed southwards by the Finke River as far as Kyre Lake (3708 sq. m.), by the Flinders Ranges, and the lower Murray River in the E., and diversified here and there by low ranges and Lakes Amadeus (NW.), Torrens and Gairdner (S.); the S. coast is penetrated by the great gulfs of Spencer and St. Vincent, round and to the N. and E. of which the bulk of the population is gathered in a region not much larger than Scotland; is the chief wheat-growing district, and other important industries are mining (chiefly copper), sheep-rearing, and wine-making; chief exports, wool, wheat, and copper; the railway and telegraph systems are well developed, the Overland Telegraph Line (1973 m.) stretching across the continent from Adelaide to Port Darwin being a marvel of engineering enterprise. Adelaide is the capital. The governor is appointed by the Crown, and there are a legislative council or upper house and an assembly or lower house. Began to be settled in 1836, and five years later became a Crown colony.

SOUTH SEA BUBBLE, the name given to the disastrous financial project set on foot by Harley (q.v.) to relieve the national debt and restore public credit, which produced an unparalleled rush of speculation, ending in the ruin of thousands of people. Through the efforts of Harley a company of merchants was induced in 1711 to buy up the floating national debt of £10,000,000 on a Government guarantee of 6 per cent. interest, and a right to a monopoly of trade in the South Seas. The shares rose by leaps and bounds as tales of the fabulous wealth of the far South Seas circulated, till, in 1720, £200 shares were quoted at £1000. earlier in the same year the company had taken over the entire national debt of upwards of 30 millions. In the craze for speculation which had seized the public hundreds of wild schemes were floated. At length the "Bubble" burst. The chairman and several directors of the company sold out when shares had reached £1000; suspicion followed, confidence vanished, stock fell, and in a few days thousands from end to end of the country were bewailing their ruin. The private estates of the fraudulent directors were confiscated for the relief of the sufferers. The Sir Robert Walpole belongs the credit of extricating the finances of the country from the muddle into which they had fallen. The South Sea Company continued to trade along legitimate business lines until 1750.

SOUTHAMPTON, an important seaport of South Hampshire, 79 m. SW. of London, situated on a small peninsula at the head of Southampton Water (a fine inlet, 11 m. by 2), between the mouths of the Itchen (E.) and the Test (W.); portions of the old town walls and four gateways still remain; is the headquarters of the Ordnance Survey; has splendid docks, and is an important steam-packet station for America, Canada, the West Indies, Brazil, and South Africa; yacht and ship building and engineering are flourishing industries.

SOUTHCOTT, JOANNA, a prophetess, born in Devon, of humble parents; became a Methodist; suffered under religious mania; gave herself out as the woman referred to in Revelation xii.; imagined herself to be with child, and predicted she would on a certain day give birth to the promised Prince of Peace, for which occasion great preparations were made, but all to no purpose; she died of drouse two months after the time predicted; she found numbers to believe in her even after her death; she traded in passports to heaven, which she called "seals," and persuaded numbers to purchase them. She left a box with instructions that it was to be opened in time of national crisis in the presence of a number of bishops; her box was X-rayed in 1927 and found to contain only rubbish, though her followers declared that the box in question was not the genuine one (1760-1814).

SOUTHEAST, town in Essex on the Thames estuary, one of the largest and most frequented holiday resorts in England; within the borough borders are Westcliff, Leigh, and Thorpe Bay; its pier is the longest in the country.

SOUTHERN CROSS, a constellation of the southern heavens, the five principal stars of which form a rough and somewhat irregular cross, the shape of which is gradually changing; it corresponds in the southern heavens to the Great Bear in the northern. SOUTHEY, ROBERT, poet-laureate, born, the son of a linen-draper, in Bristol; was expelled from Westminster School for a satirical article in the school magazine directed against hogging; in the following year (1793) entered Balliol College, where he only remained one year, leaving it a Unitarian and a red-hot republican; was for a time enamoured of Coleridge's wild pantisocratic scheme; married (1795) clandestinely Edith Fricker, sister to Mrs. Coleridge, and in disgrace with his English relatives visited his uncle in Lisbon, where in six months he laid the foundation of his knowledge of Spanish history and literature; the Church and medicine, as possible careers, had already been abandoned, and on his return to England he made a half-hearted effort to take up law; still unsettled he again visited Portugal, and finally was relieved of pecuniary difficulties by the settlement of a pension on him by an old school friend, which he relinquished in 1807 on receiving a pension from Government; meanwhile had settled at Keswick, where he prosecuted with untiring energy the craft of authorship; "Joan of Arc," "Thalaba," "Madoc," and "The Curse of Kehama" won for him the laureateship in 1813, and in the same year appeared his prose masterpiece "The Life of Nelson"; of numerous other works mention may be made of his Histories of Brazil and the Peninsular War, Lives of Bunyan and Wesley, and "Colloquies on Society" devoted a barometery offered by Pest domestic affliction—the death of children, and the insanity and death of his wife—saddened his later years, which were brightened in the last by his second marriage (1839) with the poetess and his twenty years' friend, Caroline Bowles, as a poet Southey has few readers nowadays, full of miscellaneous interest, vigour of narrative, and spirited rhythm, his poems yet lack the finer spirit of poetry; but in prose he ranks with the masters of English prose style "of a kind at once simple and scholarly" (1774-1843).

SOUTHPORT, a watering-place of Lancashire, situated on the southern shore of the Ribbles estuary, 16 m. N. of Liverpool; is a town of quite modern growth and increasing popularity; has a fine sea-shore, esplanade, park, theatre, public library, and art gallery.

SOUTHWARK, or the Borough, a division of London, on the Surrey side of the Thames, opposite the City; it sends three members to Parliament, and among its principal buildings are St. Saviour's Cathedral and Guy's Hospital.

SOUTHWELL, city in Nottinghamshire, 16 m. from the county town; it is famous chiefly for its cathedral, mostly of 12th-century work; the nave is Norman; Southwell was made a separate diocese in 1884.

SOUTHWELL, ROBERT, poet, born in Norfolk; studied at Douay, and became a Jesuit priest; came to England as a missionary, was thrown into prison, tortured ten times by the rack, and at length executed at Tyburn as a traitor for disseminating Catholic doctrine; his poems are religious chiefly, and excellent, and were finally collected under the title "St. Peter's Complaint," "Mary Magdalen's Tears, and Other Works"; "The Burning Babe" is one of his best-known productions (c. 1560-1595).

SOUVESTRE, EMILE, French novelist and playwright, born in Morlaix; at 30 he established himself in Paris as a journalist, and became noted as a writer of plays and of charming sketches of Breton life, essays, and fiction; "Les Derniers Bretons" and "Foyer Breton" are considered his best work (1806-1854).

SOUZA, MADAME DE (maiden name Adèle Marie Filieul), French novelist, born in Paris, and educated in a convent, on her leaving which she was married to the Comte de Plabaut, a man much older than herself, and with whom she lived unhappily; fled to Germany and then to England on the outbreak of the Revolution, when her husband was guillotined; afterwards returned to Paris, and as the wife of the Marquis de Souza Ribeiro presided over one of the most charming of salons, in which the chief attraction was her own bright and gifted personality; her novels, "Eugène et Rothelin," "Eugénie et Mathilde," and "Mademoiselle de Tournon," breathe the spirit of the old regime, and are full of natural and vivacious pictures of French life (1761-1836).

SOVIET, a Russian name for a workers' council, such as were first formed in the unsuccessful rising of 1905, and became the organ of government after the 1917 revolution. Every town and village has its soviet, which in turn selects workers to central committees.

BOWERBY BRIDGE, manufacturing town in West Riding of Yorkshire, 3 m. SW. of Halifax; cotton-spinning, woollen manufactures, and dyeing are the chief industries; it was the birthplace of Tillotson.

SOY, a sauce or condiment used in Japan and China; prepared from a bean which is extensively cultivated in those countries.

SOYER, ALEXIS, a famous cook, born in Meaux; turned aside from a tempting career as a vocalist and took up gastronomy as a profession; during the 1830 Revolution he narrowly escaped with his life, and went to London, where he rose to the position of cook to the Reform Club; rendered important services as a culinary expert in Ireland during the 1847 famine, and at the Crimea (1855); was the author of various highly popular works on the art of cooking, such as "The Modern Housewife" and "The Shilling Cookery Book" (1809-1858).

SPA, a watering-place in Belgium, 20 m. SE. of Liège; a favourite health and fashionable resort on account of its springs and its picturesque surroundings. For part of the Great War it was the general headquarters of the German army, and the residence of the Kaiser after the summer of 1918; it was in a hotel here that he abdicated on November 9, and it was from his château the following day that he escaped into Holland; here were conducted also negotiations for the Armistice, and in 1920 the international conference that arranged the system of reparations payments known as the Spa Percentages.

SPAHL, an Algerine cavalry soldier serving in the French army.

SPÄHLINGER, HENRY, Swiss scientist; devoted himself to the study of bacteriology, especially to tuberculosis and its treatment; director of the Geneva Bacteriological Institute (1882-).

SPAIN, a kingdom of South-West Europe, which with Portugal (less than one-fifth the size of Spain) occupies the entire Iberian Peninsula, and is divided from France on the N. by the Pyrenees Mountains, and on the E. and S. is washed by the Mediterranean; the NW. corner fronts the Bay of Biscay (N.) and the Atlantic (W.), while Portugal completes the western boundary; its area, three and one-third times the size of England and Wales, is, together with the Canaries and the Balearic Isles, divided into 49 provinces, although the more familiar names of the 14 old kingdoms, states, and provinces (New and Old Castile, Galicia, Aragon, &c.) are still in use; forms a compact square, with a regular, in parts precipitous coast-line, which is short compared with its area; is in the main a highland country, a vast plateau (2000 to 3000 ft. high) occupying the centre, buttressed and crossed by ranges (Sierra Nevada in the S., Sierra de Guadarrama, Sierra Morena, &c.), and diversified by the long valleys of the Ebro, Douro, Tago, Guadalquivir, and other lesser rivers, all of which are rapid, and only a few navigable; climate varies considerably according as one proceeds to the central plains, where extremes of heat and cold are experienced, but over all is the driest in Europe agriculture, although less than a half of the land is under cultivation, is by far the most important industry, and Valencia and Catalonia the provinces where it is most successfully carried out, wheat and other cereals, the olive, and the vine being the chief products; other important industries are mining, the Peninsula being extremely rich in the useful minerals, merino sheep farming, anchovy and sardine fisheries, wine-making, and the manufacture of cotton, silk, leather, and paper; chief exports are wine, fruits, mineral ores, oil, and cork; Madrid, Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, and Malaga are the chief towns. The widest variety of character exists among the natives of the various provinces, from the hard-working, thrifty Catalan to the lazy, improvident Murcian, but all possess the southern love "of song, dance, and colour," and have an inherent grace and dignity of manner; Roman Catholicism is the national religion; and although systems of elementary and secondary schools are in vogue, education generally is in a backward condition; the Government is a hereditary and constitutional monarchy; the Cortes consists of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies; universal suffrage and trial by jury are modern innovations. The outstanding fact in the history of Spain, after the downfall of the Roman Empire, of which she had long formed a part, is the national struggle with the Moors, who overran the peninsula in the 8th century, firmly established themselves, and were not finally overthrown till Granada, their last possession, was taken in 1492; sixteen years later the country became a united kingdom, and for a brief period, with its vast American colonies and wide European possessions, became in the 16th century the dominant power of Europe; since then she has lagged more and more in the race of nations, and her once vast colonial empire has gradually crumbled away till now, since the unsuccessful war with America in 1898, only an island or two remains to her.

SPALATO, a historic and flourishing town of Dalmatia, finely situated on a promontory on the E. side of the Adriatic, 160 m. SE. of Fiume, a place of considerable antiquity, and one of the great cities of the Roman world; is chiefly famed for the vast palace built by Diocletian, which became his residence after his abdication; subsidiary buildings and grounds were enclosed by walls, within which now a considerable part of the town stands; the noblest portions of the palace are still extant; the modern town carries on an active trade in grain, wine, and cattle; is noted for its liqueurs.

SPALDING, a market town in Lincolnshire, 34 m. NE. of Lincoln, in the heart of the Fens; has a 13th-century church and the ruined Wykeham Abbey in the vicinity; chief industries are agricultural produce and the raising of bulbs; is a railway centre.

SPALLANZANI, LAZZARO, a noted Italian scientist, born in Scandiano, in Modena, held chairs of Philosophy and Greek in the Universities of Reggio and Modena, but, more attracted to natural science, he left 1768 became professor of Natural History at Pavia; wrote elaborate accounts of expeditions to Sicily and elsewhere; overturned Buffon's theory of spontaneous generation, and in important works made some valuable contributions to physiological science (1729-1799).

SPAN, in linear measure, is half a cubit; it is a measure of natural origin, being the stretch of the fully opened hand from the little finger to the thumb, somewhere between 9 and 10 inches.

SPANDAU, an important town and fortress of Prussia, in Brandenburg, at the confluence of the Spree and Havel, 8 m. W. by N. of Berlin; in the "Julius Tower" of the powerful citadel the German war-chest of 48,000,000 was preserved; there are an arsenal and large Government cannon-foundries and powder-factories.

SPANHEIM, FRIEDRICH, a theological professor at Geneva (1631), and afterwards at Leyden (1641); author of a work on "Universal Grace" (1600-1648). His son, Ezechieel Spanheim (1629-1710) became professor of Eloquence in his native town, Geneva, and after acting as tutor to the sons of the Elector Palatine was employed on several important diplomatic missions to Italy, England, and France; meanwhile devoted his leisure to ancient law and numismatics, publishing learned works on these subjects. Friedrich Spanheim, brother of preceding, was a learned Calvinistic professor of Theology at Heidelberg (1656), and afterwards at Leyden (1632-1701).

SPANISH MAIN (i.e. mainland), a name given at one time to the Central American provinces of Spain bordering on the Caribbean Sea, and also to the Caribbean Sea itself; was the scene of the activities of buccaners, whose refugees were in its many islands.

SPARKS, JARED, president of Harvard University (1849-1852), born in Connecticut; bred a carpenter, took to study, attended Harvard, where he graduated, studied theology, and became Unitarian, becoming a minister in that body, but retired from the ministry and settled in Boston; edited the North American Review; wrote and edited biographies of eminent Americans, and edited the writings of Benjamin Franklin and George Washington (1789-1866).

SPARTA, or LACEDEMON, the capital of ancient Laconia, in the Peloponnese, on the right bank of the Eurotas, 20 m. from the sea; was 6 m. in circumference, consisted of several distinct quarters, originally separate villages, never united into a regular town; was never surrounded by walls, its walls being the bravery of its citizens. Its mythical founder was Lacedæmon, who called the city Sparta from the name of his wife; one of its early kings was Menelaus, the husband of Helen; Lycurgus (q.v.) was its law-giver; its policy was aggressive, and its sway gradually extended over the whole Peloponnese, to the extinction at the end of the Peloponnesian War of the rival power of Athens, which for a time rose to the ascendancy, and its unquestioned supremacy thereafter for 30 years, when all Greece was overborne by the Macedonian power.

SPARTACUS, leader of the revolt of the slaves at Rome, which broke out about 73 B.C., was a Thracian by birth, a man of powerful physique, in succession a shepherd, a soldier, and a captain of banditti; was in one of his predatory expeditions taken prisoner and sold to a trainer of gladiators, and became one of his slaves; persuaded his fellow-slaves to attempt their freedom, and became their chief and that of other runaways who joined them; for two years they defied and defeated one Roman army after another sent to crush them, and laid Italy waste, till at the end of that time Lucius Crassus, taking up arms in earnest, overpowered them in a decisive battle at the river Silarius, in which Spartacus was slain.

SPARTANBURG, town and county in S. Carolina, U.S.A. The town is 95 m. N.W. of Columbia and has two big collieries; cotton is the chief industry, while it is also a lumber centre.

SPASMODIC SCHOOL, name given to a small group of minor poets about the middle of the 19th century, represented by Phillips, James Bailey, Sydney Dobell, and Alexander Smith, from their strenuous, overstrained, and unnatural style.

SPATHIC IRON, an iron ore consisting largely of ferrous carbonate.

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, technically the only M.P. who is allowed to speak in Parliament proper. The House of Commons in origin is not Parliament; it deliberates by itself, and when the Commons are summoned into the presence of the King sitting in Parliament with the Lords it is the Speaker who informs that Parliament of the views and decisions of the Commons. His chief duties are to act as chairman of the House, and he can if necessary use a casting vote. The title was first borne by Sir Peter de la Mare in 1376.

SPECIAL CONSTABLES, in England men sworn in to help the police in times of emergency, a task in which all citizens are liable for employment, under penalties imposed by the 1831 Special Constables Act. This Act was passed at the time of the Reform riots, and special constables were enrolled then, during the Chartist riots, at other times of political unrest, and notably in the Great War and during the General Strike of 1926.

SPECIFIC GRAVITY, or relative density, the ratio of the mass of a substance to the mass of the same volume of water.

SPECTRAL TYPES, a system of classification of the stars, based upon their spectra; the work was initiated by Father Secchi at Rome and has been developed by a number of observers at the Harvard Observatory, especially Miss Cannon.

SPECTRUM, the name given to the coloured band, red at one end and violet at the other, which is produced when a ray of white light passes through a prism; white light appears to be a combination of light of all wave-lengths, consequently we get a continuous band of light from red to violet; if coloured light passes through a prism we get bright lines corresponding to the wave-lengths of the light present; it is possible to identify substances by the spectrum given off when they are red-hot, e.g. sodium compounds give two bright yellow lines; study of the spectra of the stars enables us to find out their composition; it is known that a substance when cold will absorb the rays of the same wave-length as those which it emits when hot; consequently white light in passing through certain substances is robbed of rays of some lengths, giving a bright spectrum with dark lines corresponding to the wave-lengths absorbed; this is known as an absorption spectrum, the study of the spectra of ionised and electrically excited gases has thrown much light on the structure of the atom.

SPECULATIVE, THE, that which we think and which as such goes no deeper than the intellect, which is but the eye of the soul, not the heart of it.

SPECULUM, an alloy of copper with 33 per cent. of tin, used for making metallic mirrors.

SPEDDING, JAMES, editor of Bacon, born in Mirehouse, near Kewick, son of a Cumberland squire; scholar and honorary Fellow of Cambridge, became in 1847 Under-Secretary of State with £2000 a year; devoted his life to the study of Bacon, the fruit of which was the "Letters and the Life of Francis Bacon, including all his Occasional Works, newly selected, and set forth with a Commentary, Biographical and Historical" in 7 vols. (1808-1881).

SPEE, MAXIMILIAN, COUNT VON, (German adl.) Born in Copenhagen, he was a pioneer of the German navy, and in November, 1914, he won the battle of Coronel against Cradock; the following month Admiral Sturdee met him off the Falkland Isles, the German squadron lost, and Von Spee went down on the Scharnhorst (1861-1914).

SPEGEL, HAQUIN, Swedish poet and archbishop of Upsala. He is chiefly known for his psalms, which are still sung in churches in Sweden, a history of the Swedish Church, and "God's Work and Rest" (1645-1714).

SPEKE, JOHN HANNING, African explorer, born in Somersetshire; became a soldier, and served in the Punjab; joined Burton in 1864 in an expedition into S. unalland, and three years after in an attempt to discover the sources of the Nile, and setting out alone discovered Victoria Nyanza, which he maintained was the source of the river, but which Burton questioned; on his return he published in 1863 an account of his discovery, which he was about to defend in the British Association when he was shot by the accidental discharge of his gun while he was out hunting (1827-1864).

SPENCE, JOSEPH, a miscellaneous writer, born in Haute; educated at and a Fellow of Oxford; his principal work, "Polymetis; or, an Inquiry into the Agreement between the Works of the Roman Poets and the Remains of Ancient Artists"; his "Anecdotes" are valuable from his acquaintance with the literary class of the time, and have preserved his name (1699-1788).

SPENCER, HERBERT, systematizer and unifier of scientific knowledge up to date, born in Derby, son of a teacher, who early inculcated him with an interest in natural objects, though he adopted at first the profession of a railway engineer, which in about eight years he abandoned for the work of his life by way of literature, his first effort being a series of "Letters on the Proper Sphere of Government" in the Newcomenist in 1842, and his first work "Social Statics," published in 1851, followed by "Principles of Psychology" four years after;

in 1861 he published a work on "Education," and his "First Principles" the following year, after which he began to construct his system of "Synthetic Philosophy," which fills a dozen large volumes, and has established his fame as the foremost scientific philosopher of the time. Following in the lines of Auguste Comte and John Stuart Mill he takes a wider sweep than either of them, fills the field he occupies with fuller and riper detail, resolves the whole of science into still more ultimate principles, and works the whole up into a more compact and comprehensive system. He is valiant before all for science, and releases everything and every interest to Agnosticism that cannot give proof of its scientific rights. "What a thing is itself," he says, "cannot be known, because to know it we must strip it of all that it becomes, of all that has come to adhere to it." The ultimate thus arrived at he finds to be, and calls, Energy, and that, therefore, he says, we do not and cannot know (1820-1903).

SPENCER GULF, a deep inlet on the coast of South Australia, 180 m. by 90 m.

SPENCER, JOHN ALFRED, British journalist. He became editor of the Westminster Gazette in 1896, and though relinquishing the editorial chair in 1922 he continued to write articles for it till it ceased publication in 1928; throughout his career as a leader writer he exercised great influence on Liberal politics (1862-).

SPENER, PHILIP JACOB, German Protestant theologian, founder of the Pietists (q.v.), born in Alsace, studied in Strasburg; in 1670 held a series of meetings which he called "Collegia Pietatis," whence the name of his sect; established himself in Dresden and in Berlin; but Halle was the centre of the movement; was an earnest and universally esteemed man (1635-1705).

SPENSER, EDMUND, author of the "Faerie Queene," and one of England's greatest poets; details of his life are scanty and often hypothetical; born in London, of poor but well-connected parents; entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, as a "sizar" in 1569, and during his seven years' residence there became an excellent scholar; took a master's degree, and formed an important friendship with Gabriel Harvey; three years of unsettled life followed, but were fruitful in the production of the "Shepherds' Calendar" (1579), which at once placed him at the head of the English poets of his day; had already taken his place in the best London literary and political circles as the friend of Sir Philip Sidney and Leicester, and in 1580 was appointed private secretary to Lord Grey, then proceeding to Ireland as the Lord Deputy, and, although his master soon returned to England, Spenser continued to make his home in Ireland, where he obtained some civil appointments, and in 1591 entered into possession of a considerable portion of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond, adjacent to his house, Killybegs Castle, Co. Cork; seems to have been a pretty stern land-lord, and, as expounded in his admirable tract, "A View of the Present State of Ireland," the advocate of a policy of "suppression and repression"; consequently was little loved by the Irish, and on the outbreak of Tyrone's rebellion in 1598 his house was sacked and burned, and he himself forced to flee to London, where he died a few weeks later "a ruined and heart-broken man"; the rich promise of the "Shepherds' Calendar" had been amply fulfilled in the "Complaints," "Amoretti," "Colin Clouts Come Home Again," the "Epithalamium," the finest bridal song in any language, and above all in the six published books of "The Faerie Queene" (1590-1596), in which all his gifts and graces as a poet are at their best (1552-1599).

SPERMACEYL, a white waxy matter obtained in an oily state from the head of the sperm-whale inhabiting the Pacific and Indian Oceans; candles made of it yield a particularly steady and bright light.

SPEY, a river in the N. of Scotland which, rising in Badenoch, flows N.E. through Inverness, Elgin, and Banffshire, falls into the Moray Firth after a course of 107 miles; the salmon-fisheries are valuable; it is the swiftest of the rivers of Great Britain.

SPEZIA, the chief naval station, "the Portofino" of Italy; occupies a strongly fortified site at the head of a bay on the W. side of Italy, 56 m. S.E. of Genoa; here are the naval ship-building yards, national arsenal, navy store-houses, besides schools of navigation; manufactures mostly of cables and sail-cloth.

SPHEROIDAL STATE, the phenomenon observed when a drop of water falls on a very hot metal; it remains on the surface as a small globe instead of evaporating at once; the formation of a layer of such globules explains how it is that a white hot iron may be licked without harm to the tongue and the arm plunged into molten lead, if moistened.

SPHINX, a fabled animal, an invention of the ancient Egyptians, with the body and claws of a lioness, and the head of a woman, or of a ram, or of a goat, all types or representations of the king, effigies of which are frequently placed before temples on each side of the approach; the most famous of the sphinxes was the one which waylaid travellers and tormented them with a riddle, which if they could not answer she devoured them, but which (Œdipus answered, whereupon she threw herself into the sea.

SPICE ISLANDS. See MOLUCCAS.

SPIELHAGEN, FRIEDRICH, German writer. A graduate of Berlin and Bonn, he took to journalism, spent some time in sociological studies, publishing a series of books dealing with working-class conditions, and in 1870 started writing novels with a sociological background (1829-1911).

SPILSBURY, SIR BERNARD, British pathologist, pathological expert to the Home Office.

SPINELLO, ARETINO, a celebrated Italian fresco-painter, born in Arezzo, where, with visits to Florence, his life was chiefly spent; was in his day the rival of Giotto, but few of his frescoes are preserved, and such of his paintings as are to be found in various galleries of Europe are inferior to his frescoes (1330-1410).

SPINET, or VIRGINAL, a musical instrument, with a keyboard, in vogue between 1500 and 1700.

SPINNING JENNY, an invention of James Hargreaves of Blackburn, embodying the first principles of machine spinning. It was worked by hand, and later improved by Arkwright and Crompton.

SPINOLA, AMBROSIO, MARQUIS OF, great Spanish general under Philip II. of Spain, born in Genoa; with a following of 9000, maintained at his own expense, took Ostend after a resistance of 3 years, in consequence of which feat he was appointed commander-in-chief, in which capacity he maintained a long struggle with Prince Maurice of Nassau, terminated only with the death of the latter; his services on behalf of Spain, in the interest of which he spent his fortune, were never acknowledged, and he died in poignant grief (1571-1650).

SPINOZA, BENEDICTUS DE, great modern philosopher, born in Amsterdam, of Jews of Portuguese extraction in well-to-do circumstances, and early trained as a scholar; began with the study of the Bible and the Talmud, but soon exchanged the study of theology in these for that of physics and the works of Descartes, in which inquiry he drifted farther and farther from the Jewish creed, and at length openly abandoned it; this exposed him to a persecution which threatened his life, so that he left Amsterdam and finally settled at The Hague, where, absorbed in philosophic study, he lived in seclusion, earning a livelihood by polishing optical glasses, which his friends disposed of for him; his days were short; he suffered from ill-health, and died of consumption when he was only 44; he was a man of tranquil temper, moderate desires, purity of motive, and kindly in heart; his great work, his "Ethics," was published a year after his death; he had held it back during his lifetime because he foresaw it would procure him the name of atheist, which he shrank from with horror; Spinoza's doctrine is summed up by Dr. Stirling thus, "Whatever is, is; and that is extension and thought. These two are all that is; and besides these there is naught. But these two are one; they are attributes of the single substance (that which, for its existence, stands in need of nothing else), very God, in whom, then, all individual things and all individual ideas (modes of extension those, of thought these) are comprehended and take place"; thus we see that Spinoza includes under the term extension all individual objects, and under thought all individual ideas, and these two he includes in God, as He in whom they live and move and have their being,—a great conception and a pregnant, being the speculative ground of the being of all that lives and is; not without good reason does Novallis call him "Der Gott-ertrunkene Mensch," the God-intoxicated man (1632-1677).

SPINOZISM, the pantheism of Spinoza (q.v.), which regards God as the one self-subsistent substance, and both matter and thought attributes of Him.

SPION KOP, a battle in the Boer war fought in January, 1900, and resulting in heavy British losses.

STATIONS OF THE CROSS, steps in the passage of Jesus from the Judgment-hall to Calvary, or representations of these, before each one of which the faithful are required to kneel and offer up a prayer.

STATIUS, PUBLIUS PAPINUS, a Latin poet, born in Naples; lived at Rome, flourished at court, particularly that of Domitian, whom he flattered, but retired to his native place after defeat in a competition, his chief work is the "Thebais," an epic in 12 books, embodying the legends connected with the war against Thebes; he ranks first among the poets of the silver age; a collection of short pieces of his named "Silva" have been often reprinted (61-98).

STAUBACH (dust stream), a famous waterfall near Lauterbrunnen, 8 m. S. of Interlaken, with a sheer descent of 980 ft.; in the sunlight it has the appearance of a rainbow-hued transparent veil, and before it reaches the ground it is dissipated in silvery spray.

STAUNTON, HOWARD, a famous chess-player; was an Oxford man, and led a busy life as a journalist and miscellaneous writer in London; won the chess championship in 1843, and did much to extend the scientific study of the game by various publications, "The Chess-Player's Handbook," &c.; was also held in high repute as a Shakespearean scholar; published well-annotated editions of Shakespeare's works and a facsimile of the first folio (1810-1874).

STAVANGER, a flourishing port of Norway, on a fiord on the SW. coast, 100 m. S. of Bergen, is of modern aspect, having been largely rebuilt; has two excellent harbours, a fine 11th-century Gothic cathedral, and is the centre of important coast fisheries.

STAVROPOL, a Russian government on the Caspian Sea, the inhabitants of which are chiefly nomads and breed horses, with a capital of the same name on a hill, a modern town and a prosperous, both in manufacture and trade.

STEAD, WILLIAM THOMAS, British journalist. He was editor of the Northern Echo at Darlington in 1871, and succeeded Morley in the editorship of the Pall Mall Gazette in 1883. For 16 years he held that position, starting London with sensational news stories, and landing himself in trouble by conspiring with General William Booth of the Salvation Army to procure a girl of 13 and transport her to the Continent, where she was placed in safe hands, in order to show how lax were the regulations against the white slave traffic; in his paper he gave the story as "The Maiden Tribute," and although he was sentenced to gaol his action led to the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Founded the Review of Reviews in 1890; wrote among other books "The Truth about Russia," "If Christ came to Chicago," and "Satan's Invisible World." He was drowned when the Titanic sank (1849-1912).

STEDMAN, EDMUND CLARENCE, American poet and critic. Educated at Yale, he began his career as a journalist, and in 1881 acted as war correspondent in the Civil War for The New York World. His first collected volume of poems was published in 1890; he also brought out several critical books, "Poets of America" and "Victorian Poets" among them (1833-1908).

STEEL, iron containing between 2.0 and 0.1 per cent of carbon; a small change in the carbon content gives rise to a large change in the properties of the steel, which also depend upon the method by which it is cooled; sudden cooling or chilling produces a hard, brittle metal, whilst if it is slowly cooled, or annealed, ductile steel is produced; properties intermediate between the two extremes may be obtained by tempering the steel; steel for certain purposes contains manganese, chromium, tungsten, or nickel.

STEEL, FLORA ANNIE, British novelist. Marrying a Bengal civil servant in 1867, she spent many years in India, taking the country as a setting for many of her books, of which "On the Face of the Waters," "The Roofs of the Lord," "Kins-Errant," and "The Potter's Thumb" are among the best-known; was at one time an inspectress of schools in the Punjab (1847-1929).

STEEL, SIR JOHN, sculptor, born in Aberdeen; studied at Edinburgh and Rome; made his mark in 1832 by a model of a statue, "Alexander and Bucephalus," and soon took rank with the foremost and busiest sculptors of his day; his works are mostly to be found in Edinburgh, and include the equestrian statue of Wellington, statues of Sir Walter Scott (in the Scott Monument), Professor Wilson, Dr. Chalmers, Allan Ramsay, &c.; the splendid figure of Queen Victoria over the Royal Institution gained him the appointment (1844) of sculptor to Her Majesty in Scotland, and on the unveiling of his fine equestrian statue of Prince Albert in 1876 he was created a knight (1804-1891).

STEVE, SIR RICHARD, a famous English essayist, born, the son of an attorney, in Dublin; educated as a foundationer at the Charterhouse and at Oxford; enamoured of a soldier's life enlisted (1804) as a cadet in the Life Guards; in the following year received an ensigncy in the Coldstream Guards, and continued in the army till 1708, by which time he had attained the rank of a captain; a good deal of literary work was done during his soldiering, notably "The Christian Hero" and several comedies; appointed Gazetteer (1707), and for some two years was in the private service of the Prince Consort, George of Denmark; began in 1709 to issue the famous, tri-weekly paper, the Tatler, in which, with little assistance, he played the part of social and literary censor about town, couching his remarks in light and graceful essays, which constituted a fresh departure in literature; largely aided by Addison, his old school companion, he developed this new form of essay in the Spectator and Guardian; sat in Parliament as a zealous Whig, and in George I.'s reign was knighted and received various minor court appointments; continued a busy writer of pamphlets, &c., but withal mismanaged his affairs, and died in Wales, secured from actual penury by the property of his second wife, as a writer shares with Addison the glory of the Queen Anne Essay, which in their hands did much to purify, elevate, and refine the mind and manners of the time (1672-1729).

STEEN, JAN, Dutch painter, born in Leyden; was a genre painter of the style of Rembrandt; and his paintings display severity with sympathy and a playful humour; he is said to have led a dissipated life, and to have left his wife and a large family in extreme destitution (1626-1679).

STER, P. WILSON, British artist. Born in Birkenhead he studied in Paris, and returned to England an ardent Impressionist and disciple of Degas and Renoir, but he later developed a style of his own in which English traditions were blended with French; landscapes are his forte, though he is a fine portrait painter as well, and his work is found in several galleries of Europe (1860-).

STEEVENS, GEORGE, commentator on Shakespeare, born in Stepney; in 1736 edited 20 of Shakespeare's plays carefully reprinted from the original quartos, and in 1731 his notes with those of Johnson in another edition; a further edition, with a number of gratuitous alterations of the text, was issued by him in 1793, and that was the accepted one till the publication of Knight's in 1838 (1736-1800).

STEFANSSON, VILHEJLMAR, explorer. Of Icelandic parentage, he was born in Canada and educated in the United States; his first expedition was in 1908, when he discovered Victoria Land; between 1913 and 1918 he was again in the Arctic, discovering Prince Patrick Land (1879-).

STEGOSAURUS, a species of dinosaur found in the upper Jurassic beds of North America; their backs were covered with heavy bony plates; like the Brontosaurus, they were herbivorous.

STEIN, BARON VON, Prussian statesman, born in Nassau; rose rapidly in the service of the State, and became Prussian Prime Minister under William III. In 1807, in which capacity he effected important changes in the constitution of the country to its lasting benefit, till Napoleon procured his dismissal, and he withdrew to Austria, and at length to St. Petersburg, where he was instrumental in turning the general tide against Napoleon (1787-1831).

STEIN, CHARLOTTE VON, a lady friend of Goethe, born in Weimar; Goethe's affection for her cooled on his return from Italy to see her so changed; she never forgave him for marrying a woman beneath him; letters by Goethe to her were published in successive editions, but hers to him were destroyed by her (1742-1827).

STEINMETZ, CARL FRIEDRICH VON, Prussian general, born in Eisenach; distinguished himself in the war of 1813-1814, and inflicted crushing defeats on the Austrians in 1866; fell below his reputation in the Franco-German War, and was deprived of his command after the battle of Gravelotte, but was elected Governor-General of Posen and Silesia (1796-1873).

STEINTHAL, HEYMANN, German philologist, born in Gröbzig, in Anhalt; studied at Berlin, where in 1863 he became professor of Comparative Philology, and in 1872 lecturer at the Jewish High School on Old Testament Criticism and Theology; author of various learned and acute works on the science of language (1823-1899).

STELLA, the name under which Swift has immortalised Hester Johnson, the story of whose life is inseparably entwined with that of the great Dean; was the daughter of a lady-companion of Lady Gifford, the sister of Sir William Temple, who, it is conjectured, was her father. Swift first met her, a child of seven, when he assumed the duties of amanuensis to Sir William Temple in 1688, and during his subsequent residence with Sir William (1696-1699) stood to her in the progressive relationship of tutor, friend, and lover; but for some unaccountable reason it would seem they never married, although their mutual affection and intimacy endured till her death; to her was addressed, without thought of publication, the immortal "Journal to Stella," "the most faithful and fascinating diary the world has ever seen," which throws an invaluable flood of light on the character of Swift, revealing unsuspected tendernesses and affections in the great satirist (1681-1728).

STELLAR EVOLUTION, the modern theory of the development of the stars from the giant to the dwarf stage; the process appears to be accompanied by a gradual change of spectrum, a shrinkage in volume, and an increase in density as well as a loss of mass; it is now considered that the supply of energy of a star is kept up by annihilation of matter.

STENCILLING, a cheap and simple process of printing on various surfaces letters or designs; the characters are cut out in thin plates of metal or card-board, which are then laid on the surface to be imprinted, and the colour, by means of a brush, rubbed through the cut spaces.

STENO, NICHOLAS, a noted anatomist, born in Copenhagen, where he studied medicine and kindred sciences with great enthusiasm; became widely known in European medical circles by his important investigations into the natural functions of glands (salivary and parotid), the heart, brain, &c.; in 1687 became physician to the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, residing at Florence, where he renounced Lutheranism for Catholicism; made valuable geological investigations, but finally gave himself up to a religious life; was created a bishop, and in 1677 Vicar-Apostolic of North Germany; chiefly remembered for his contributions to anatomical science (1638-1686).

STENTOR, a Grecian herald who accompanied the Greeks in the Trojan War, and whom Homer describes as "the great-hearted, braven-voiced Stentor, whose shout was as loud as that of fifty other men," hence the epithet stentorian.

STEPHEN, king of England from 1135 to 1154, nephew of Henry I., his mother being Adela, daughter of William I.; acquired French possessions through the favour of his uncle and by his marriage; in 1127 swore fealty to his cousin Matilda, daughter of Henry I., as his future sovereign, but on the death of his uncle usurped the throne, an action leading to a violent civil war, which brought the country into a state of anarchy; the Scots invaded on behalf of Matilda, but were beaten back at Northallerton (the Battle of the Standard, 1138); foreign mercenaries introduced by the king only served to embitter the struggle; the clergy, despoiled by the king, turned against him, and in the absence of a strong central authority the barons oppressed the people and fought with one another; "Adulterine Castles" sprang up over the country, and "men said openly that Christ and His saints were asleep"; in 1141 Matilda won the battle of Lincoln and for a few months ruled the country, but, "as much too harsh as Stephen was too lenient," she rapidly became unpopular, and Stephen was soon again in the ascendant; the successes of Henry, son of Matilda, led in 1153 to the treaty of Wallingford, by which it was arranged that Stephen should retain the crown for life, while Henry should be his heir; both joined in suppressing the turbulent barons and the "Adulterine Castles"; more fortunately circumstanced, Stephen had many qualities which might have made him a popular and successful king (c. 1094-1154).

STEPHEN, the name of nine Popes: S. I., Pope from 253 to 257, signalled by his zeal against the heresies of his time; S. II., Pope from 752 to 757, in whose reign, under favour of Pope le Bref, began the temporal power of the Popes; S. III., Pope from 768 to 772, sanctioned the worship of saints and images; S. IV., Pope from 816 to 817; S. V., Pope from 885 to 891, distinguished for his charity; S. VI., Pope from 896 to 897, strangled after a reign of 18 months; S. VII., Pope from 829 to 851, entirely under the control of his mistress; S. VIII., Pope from 939 to 942; S. IX., Pope from 1057 to 1058, vigorously opposed the sale of benefices and the immorality of the clergy.

STEPHEN, JAMES, slavery abolitionist, born in Dorsetshire; held a post in the West Indies; wrote "Slavery in the British West Indies," an able book; had some more or less distinguished in law and law practice (1758-1832).

STEPHEN, SIR JAMES, British judge. He is chiefly remembered for the valuable books he wrote on criminal law and his famous "Digest of the Laws of England" (1829-1844).

STEPHEN, SIR LESLIE, man of letters, born in Kensington, educated at Eton and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow; became editor of the Cornhill and of the first 26 volumes of the "Dictionary of National Biography"; is the author of "Hours of a Library" and "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century," books that produced a deep impression; he also produced several biographies, distinguished at once by accuracy, elegance, and critical acumen (1832-1904).

STEPHEN, ST., protomartyr of the Christian Church, who (as it is supposed) died in A.D. 32; his death is a frequent subject of the old ballads, the saint himself being less frequently depicted, but when so he is represented usually in a demon's dress, bearing a stone in one hand and a palm-branch in the other, or both hands full of stones.

STEPHENS, GEORGE, archaeologist, born in Liverpool; settled in Sweden, and became professor of English in Copenhagen; his great work entitled "Old Northern Runic Monuments of Scandinavia and England" (1818-1895).

STEPHENS, JAMES, Fenian conspirator, born in Kilkenny; became "Head Centre," and zealous in the Fenian cause both in Ireland and America; was arrested in Dublin, but escaped; found his way to New York, but was deposed, and sank out of sight (1824-1901).

STEPHEN'S, ST., the Parliament House of Westminster, distinguished from St. James's, which denotes the Court, as Downing Street does the Government.

STEPHENSON, GEORGE, improver of the locomotive, born, the son of a poor colliery engineer, in Wylam, near Newcastle; was early set to work, first as a cowherd and then as a turnip-hoer, and by 15 was earning 12s a week as fireman at Throckley Bridge Colliery, diligently the while acquiring the elements of education; married at 21, and supplemented his wage as brakeman at Killingworth Colliery by mending watches and shoes; in 1815 invented a safety-lamp for miners, which brought him a public testimonial of £1000; while at Killingworth turned his attention to the application of steam to machinery, and thus constructed his first locomotive in 1814 for the colliery tram-road; railway and locomotive construction now became the business of his life; superintended the construction of the Stockton and Darlington Railway (1821-1825), the Liverpool and Manchester Railway (1825-1829), over which he ran his locomotive, the "Rocket," at a maximum rate of 25 m. an hour; in the outburst of railway enterprise which now ensued, Stephenson's services were in requisition all over the country; became principal engineer on many of the new railways; bought the country-seat of Tipton, near Chesterfield, to which he retired for much-needed rest; a man of character, gentle and simple in his affections, strong and purposeful in his labours (1781-1845).

STEPHENSON, ROBERT, son of preceding, born in Willington Quay, was well educated at Newcastle, and for a session at Edinburgh University; began in 1823 to assist his father, and from 1824 to 1827 fulfilled an engineering engagement in Colombia, South America; rendered valuable service in the construction of the "Rocket," and as joint-engineer with his father of the London and Birmingham line was mainly responsible for its construction; turning his attention especially to bridge-building, he constructed the Britannia and Conway Tubular bridges, besides many others, including those over the Nile, St. Lawrence, &c.; was returned to the House of Commons in 1847; received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour from the French emperor, and many other distinctions at home and abroad; was buried in Westminster Abbey (1803-1859).

STEPNIAK, SERGIUS, Russian Nihilist and apostle of freedom; exiled himself to England; author of "Underground Russia" (1852-1896).

STEPES, the name given to wide, treeless plains, barren except in spring, of the SE. of Russia and SW. of Siberia.

STEREOMETER, a scientific instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids, invented by a Frenchman named Say in 1796.

STEREOSCOPE, a simple optical apparatus which, when two photographs of an object taken from slightly different standpoints (so as to secure the appearance it presents to either eye singly) are placed under its twin magnifying lenses, presents to the eyes of the looker a single picture of the object standing out in natural relief.

STERNE, LAURENCE, English humorist, born in Clonmel, Ireland, son of Roger Sterne, captain in the army; his mother an Irishwoman; was educated at Halifax and Cambridge by-and-by took orders and received living in Sutton and Shillington, became a prebend at York, and finally got a living at Oxford; in 1759 appeared the first two volumes of "Tristram Shandy," and in 1767 the last two; in 1768 his "Sentimental Journey," and in the interim his "Sermons," equally characteristic of the man as the two former productions. Stopford Brooke says, "They have no plot, they can scarcely be said to have any story. The story of 'Tristram Shandy' wanders like a man in a labyrinth, and the humour is as labyrinthine as the story. It is carefully invented, and whimsically subtle; and the sentiment is sometimes true, but mostly affected. But a certain unity is given to the book by the admirable consistency of the characters, of whom 'Uncle Toby' is the masterpiece," the author died in London of pulmonary consumption (1713-1768).

STERNHOLD, THOMAS, principal author of the first English metrical version of the Psalms, originally attached to the Prayer-Book as augmented by John Hopkins; continued in general use till Tate and Brady's version of 1696 was substituted in 1717; was a Hampshire man, and held the post of Groom of the Robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. (1500-1549).

STEROPES, one of the three Cyclopes (q.v.).

STERICHORUS, a celebrated Greek lyric poet, born in Sicily; contemporary of Sappho, Alcaeus, and Pindarus; at his birth it is said a nightingale alighted on his lips and sang a sweet strain (652-652 B.C.).

STETHOSCOPE, a medical instrument used to listen to the action of the heart and chest organs, invented by Dr. Laennec in France in 1816.

STETTIN, capital of Pomerania, and a flourishing river-port on both banks of the Oder, 30 m. from its entrance into the Baltic, and 60 m. N.E. of Berlin; lies contiguous to, and is continuous with, the smaller towns of Bredow, Grabow, and Züllichow; principal buildings are the royal palace (18th century), the Gothic church of St. Peter (12th century), and St. James's (14th century); is a busy hive of industry, turning out ships, cement, sugar, and spirits, and carrying on a large export and import trade.

STEUEN, BARON VON, general in the American War of Independence, born in Magdeburg; originally in the Prussian service under Frederick the Great, and had distinguished himself at the siege of Prague and at Rossbach, emigrating to America at the end of the Seven Years' War, he offered his services, which were readily welcomed, and contributed to organise and discipline the colonists' army, to the success of the revolution (1730-1794).

STEVENSON, ROBERT, an eminent Scottish engineer, born in Glasgow, the son of a West India merchant; adopted the profession of his stepfather, Thomas Smith, and in 1796 succeeded him as first engineer to the Board of Northern Lighthouses, a position he held for 47 years, during which he planned and erected as many as 23 lighthouses round the coasts of Scotland, his most noted erection being that on the Bell Rock; introduced the catoptric system of illumination and other improvements; was also much employed as a consulting engineer in connection with bridges, harbours, canal, and railway construction (1772-1850).

STEVENSON, ROBERT LOUIS BALFOUR, novelist and essayist, grandson of the preceding, born in Edinburgh, where in 1875 he was called to the bar, after disappointing his father by not following the family vocation of engineering; had already begun to write for the magazines, and soon abandoned law for the profession of letters, in which he rapidly came to the front. In 1878 appeared his first book, "An Inland Voyage," quickly followed by "Travels with a Donkey," "Virginitas Puerique," "Familiar Studies"; with "Treasure Island" (1883) found a wider public as a writer of adventure and romance, and established himself permanently in the public favour with "Kidnapped" (1886), "The Master of Ballantrae," "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," &c., his versatility in letters was further revealed in his charming "A Child's Garden of Verse," "Ballads," "Memories and Portraits," and "A Footnote to History" (on Samoan politics); in 1890 falling health induced him to make his home in the island of Samoa, where he wrote "The Bottle Imp" and other South Sea stories, "The Ebb Tide," "The Wrecker," and the unfinished "St. Ives," and where he died (1850-1894).

STEVINUS DE BRUGES, Flemish scientist, an early experimenter who helped to lay the foundations of mechanics, especially in connection with the pulley and lever and their practical applications.

STEWART, LORD HIGH, in early times the highest office of state in England, ranking in power next to the sovereign; hereditary during many centuries, the office lapsed in the reign of Henry IV., and since has been revived only on special occasions, e.g. a coronation, a trial of a peer, at the termination of which the office is demitted, the Lord High Steward himself breaking in two his wand of office.

STEWART, BALFOUR, physicist, born in Edinburgh; after finishing his university curriculum went to Australia and engaged for some time in business; returned to England; became director at Kew Observatory, and professor of Natural Philosophy at Owens College, Manchester; made discoveries in radiant heat, and was one of the founders of spectrum analysis (q.v.); published text-books on physics, in wide repute (1828-1887).

STEWART, DUGALD, Scottish philosopher, born in Edinburgh, son of Matthew Stewart; attended the High School and the University; studied one session at Glasgow under Dr. Reid; assisted his father in conducting the mathematical classes in Edinburgh, and succeeded Adam Ferguson in the Moral Philosophy chair in 1785, a post, the active duties of which he discharged with signal success for twenty-five years, lecturing on a wide range of subjects connected with metaphysics and the science of mind; he wrote "Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind," "Philosophical Essays," &c. (1758-1828).

STEWART, HOUSE OF. See STUART.

STEWART, MATTHEW, mathematician, born in Rothsay; bred for the Church, was for a time minister of Rosemest, and succeeded MacLaurin as professor of Mathematics in Edinburgh in 1747; was the author of a mathematical treatise or two, and the lifelong friend of Robert Simson (1717-1785).

STEYER, a manufacturing town of Upper Austria, at the junction of the Steyer and Enns, 20 m. N.E. of St. Valentin; noted for its flourishing iron and steel manufactures, of which it is the chief seat in Austria.

STHENO, one of the three Gorgons (q.v.).

STIBNITE, a mineral from which antimony is obtained.

STIEGLER, ADOLF, a celebrated German cartographer, born in Gotha; his atlases are deservedly held in high esteem for their excellence (1775-1836).

STIER, BUDOLF EWALD, German theologian; was a devout student of the Bible as the very Word of God, and is best known as the author of the "Words of the Lord Jesus" (1890-1892).

STIGAND, archbishop of Canterbury and favourite of Edward the Confessor, who advanced him to the bishoprics of Elmham and Winchester and to the Primacy in 1052; his appointment was popularly regarded as uncanonical, and neither Harold nor William the Conqueror allowed him to perform the ceremony of coronation; through William's influence was by the Pope deprived of his office and condemned to imprisonment; d. 1072.

STIGMATA, impressions of marks corresponding to certain wounds received by Christ at His crucifixion, with which certain of the saints are said to have been supernaturally marked in memory of His St. Francis in particular showed such marks.

STILICHO, FLAVIUS, a Roman general, son of a Vandal captain under the emperor Valens; on the death of Theodosius I., under whom he served, became the ruler of the West, and by his military abilities saved the Western Empire; defeated Alaric the Goth in a decisive battle and compelled him to retire from Italy, as he did another horde of invading barbarians afterwards; aspired to be master of the Roman empires, but was assassinated at Ravenna in 408.

STILL, JOHN, bishop of Bath and Wells, born in Grantham; rose in the Church through a succession of preferments; is credited with the authorship of one of the oldest comedies in the English language, "Gammer Gurton's Needle," turning on the loss and recovery by her of the needle with which she was mending her goodman's breeches (1543-1608).

STILLINGFLEET, EDWARD, bishop of Worcester, born in Dorsetshire; was a scholarly man, wrote on apologetics, in defence of the Church of England as a branch of the Church Catholic, in support of the doctrine of the Trinity, and in advocacy of harmony in the Church; was an able controversialist and a generous-minded; was a handsome man, and popularly called the "Beauty of Holiness" (1635-1699).

STIMMER, HUGO, German industrialist and financier. Inheriting a fortune from his father, he was an official government contractor in the Great War, and subsequently acquired control of the coal, iron, and steel industries, besides several newspapers and shipping companies, making himself the most powerful man in the country (1870-1924).

STIFFLE, a mode of engraving by dots instead of lines, each dot when magnified showing a group of small ones.

STIRLING, JAMES HUTCHISON, master in philosophy, born in Glasgow; bred to medicine and practised for a time in South Wales; went to Germany to study developments in philosophy there, on his return to Scotland published, in 1853, his "Secret of Hegel; being the Hegelian System in Origin, Principle, Form, and Matter," which has proved epoch-making, and has for motto the words of Hegel, "The Hidden Secret of the Universe is powerless to resist the might of thought! It must disclose before it, revealing to sight and bringing to enjoyment its riches and its depths." It was followed in 1881 by his "Text-book to Kant," an exposition which his "Secret" presupposes, and which he advised the students of it to expect, that they might be able to construe the entire Hegelian system from its root in Kant. He was elected to be the first Clifford Lecturer in Edinburgh University, and his admirers had to content themselves with that modicum of acknowledgment. He was the author of a critique on Sir William Hamilton's theory of perception, on Huxley's doctrine of protoplasm, and on Darwinianism, besides a translation of Schwegler's "History of Philosophy," with notes, a highly serviceable work (1820-1909).

STIRLING, WILLIAM ALEXANDER, EARL OF, poet, born in Menstrie, near Alloa; was for a time tutor to the family of Argyll; was the author of sonnets called "Aurora," some curious tragedies, and an "Elegy on the Death of Prince Henry"; he was held in high honour by James VI. and followed him to London, obtained a grant of Nova Scotia, and was made Secretary of State for Scotland; he has been ranked as a poet with Drummond of Hawthornden, who was his friend (1587-1640).

STIRLING, the county town of Stirlingshire, and one of the most ancient and historically interesting cities of Scotland; occupies a fine site on the Forth, 36 m. N.W. of Edinburgh and 20 m. N.E. of Glasgow; most prominent feature is the rocky castle hill, rising at the westward end of the town to a height of 420 ft., and crowned by the ancient castle, a favourite Stuart residence and associated with many stirring events in Scottish history, but utilised now as a garrison station; interesting also are Argyll's Lodgings, Greyfriars Church (Dedicated Gothic of the 15th century), the fine statue of Bruce, &c.; has manufactures of tartans, tweeds, carpets, &c., and a trade in agricultural and mining products.

STIRLINGSHIRE, a midland county of Scotland, stretching E. and W. from Dumbarton (W.) to the Forth (E.); between Lanark (N.) and Perth (N.). It forms the border-land between the Lowlands and the Highlands; Loch Lomond skirts the western border, and on the northern Loch Katrine, stretching into Fife; Ben Lomond and lesser heights rise in the N.W.; main streams are the Avon, Carron, Bannock, &c.; between Alloa and Stirling stretches the fertile and well-cultivated plain, "The Carse of Stirling"; in the W. lies a portion of the great western coal-field, from which coal and ironstone are largely extracted; principal towns are Stirling (q.v.), Falkirk, and Kilmarnock; interesting remains of Antonine's Wall, from Forth to Clyde, still exist; within its borders were fought the battles of Bannockburn, Sauchieburn, Stirling Bridge, and Falkirk.

STIRRUP CUP, a "parting cup" given by the Highlanders to guests when they are leaving and have their feet in the stirrups.

STOBÆUS, JOANNES, a native of Stobi, in Macedonia; flourished at the end of the 5th and beginning of the 6th centuries; celebrated as the compiler (about 500 A.D.) of a Greek Anthology, through which many valuable extracts are preserved to us from works which have since his day been lost.

STOCK EXCHANGE, a mart for the buying and selling of Government stocks, company shares, and various securities, carried on usually by the members of an associated body of brokers having certain rules and regulations. Such associations exist now in most of the important cities of the United Kingdom and commercial world generally (on the Continent are known as Bourses). The London Stock Exchange, transacting business in handsome buildings in Capel Court, facing the Bank of England, was established in 1801, stock-exchange transactions previous to then being carried on in a loose, ill-regulated fashion by private parties chiefly in and around Change Alley, the scene of the memorable South Sea Bubble (q.v.) speculation. The great development in stock exchange business in recent times is due chiefly to the sale of foreign and colonial bonds, and the remarkable growth and spread of joint-stock companies since the Joint-Stock Company Act of 1862.

STOCKHOLM, capital of Sweden; occupies a charming site on the channel leading out of Lake Mälaren into a bay of the Baltic; stands partly on the mainland and partly on nine islands, communication between which is facilitated by handsome bridges and a busy service of boats. Its wooded and rocky islands, crowned with handsome buildings, its winding water-ways, pebbly shores, crowded wharves, and outlook over the belated lake, combine to make it one of the most picturesque cities of Europe; Town Island, the nucleus of the city, is occupied by the royal palace, House of Nobles, principal wharf, &c., while on Rindögns Island stand the Houses of Parliament, law-courts, and other public buildings, Norrmalm, with the Academy of Science, National Museum, Academy of Fine Arts, Hop Garden, &c., is the finest quarter of the city, manufactures embrace sugar, tobacco, silks, linen, and cotton, besides which there are flourishing ironworks and a busy export trade in iron and steel, oats, and tar, despite the hindrance caused by the ice during three or four months in winter, founded in 1256 by Birger Jarl.

STOCKMAR, BARON VON, statesman, born in Coburg; bred to medicine, became physician to Leopold I. of Belgium, and at length his adviser; was adviser also of Queen Victoria before her accession; accompanied Prince Albert to Italy before his marriage, and joined him thereafter in England as the trusted friend of both the Queen and him. He had two political ideals—a united Germany under Prussia, and unity of purpose between Germany and England (1787-1863).

STOCKPORT, a cotton town of East Cheshire, occupies a site on the slopes of narrow gorge overlooking the confluence of the Thame and troyt (forming the Mersey), 37 m. E. of Liverpool; a handsome viaduct spans the river; has an old grammar-school, free library, technical school, &c.; during last century grew to be a busy centre of cotton manufactures, and has besides flourishing iron and brass foundries, machine-shops, and breweries.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES, a prosperous manufacturing town and port of Durham, on the Tees, 4 m. from its mouth; an iron bridge spanning the river connects it with Thornaby-on-Tees; has several fine public buildings; steel and iron shipbuilding, potteries, foundries, machine-shops are flourishing industries; iron and earthenware are the chief exports, and with imports of corn and timber give rise to a busy and increasing shipping, facilitated by the excellent river-way.

STOICS, from the disciples of Zeno; derived their name from the stoa or portico in Athens where their master taught and founded the school in 340 B.C. The doctrines of the school were completely antagonistic to those of Epicurus, and among the disciples of it are to be reckoned some of the noblest spirits of the heathen world immediately before and after the advent of Christ. These appear to have been attracted to it by the character of its moral teachings, which were of a high order indeed. The principle of morality was defined to be conformity to reason, and the duty of man to lie in the subduing of all passion and a composed submission to the will of the gods. It came short of Christian morality, as indeed all Greek philosophy did, in not recognising the Divine significance and power of humility, and especially in its failure to see, still more to conform to, the great doctrine of Christ which makes the salvation of a man to depend on the interest he takes in, as well as in the fact of the salvation of, other men. The Stoic morality is selfish; the morality of Christ is brotherly.

STOKE-UPON-TRENT, chief seat of the "Potteries," in Staffordshire, on the Trent and the Trent and Mersey Canal, 15 m. SE. of Crewe; is of modern growth, with free library, infirmary, public baths, and a statue to Wedgwood, and is busily engaged STOLE, a long scarf worn by bishops and priests in the administration of the sacraments of the Church, and sometimes when preaching, as well as in symbol of authority.

STOLYPIN, PETER ARKADZHEVIC, Russian politician. He held several important administrative posts, and in 1906, one of the most troubled years in Russian history, he became Prime Minister; in 1911 he was assassinated at Kieff (1863-1911).

STONE AGE, the name given to that period in the history of civilisation when the weapons of war and the chase and the implements of industry were made of stone, prior to employment for these purposes of bronze, characteristic of the age succeeding; is divided into two periods, the Palæolithic, or Early Stone Age, and Neolithic, or Later Stone Age (q.v.).

STONE CIRCLES, circles of standing stones (q.v.) found in various parts of Great Britain, North Europe generally, and also, but of more recent origin, in North India; were certainly, in most cases, set up to mark the circular boundary of a place of burial; erroneously ascribed in this country to the Druids; from the character of numerous cinerary urns exhumed, seem to have belonged to the bronze age in Great Britain; most interesting are those of Stennik, in Orkney, with a circumference of 340 ft., Avebury, in Wiltshire, and Stonehenge (q.v.).

STONEHAVEN, fishing port and county town of Kincardineshire, situated at the entrance of Carron Water (dividing the town) into South Bay, 16 m. SSW. of Aberdeen; has a small harbour, and is chiefly engaged in herring and haddock fishing.

STONEHENGE, the greatest and best preserved of the stone circles (q.v.) of Britain, situated in Salisbury Plain, Wiltshire, 7 m. N. of Salisbury; "consists of two concentric circles, enclosing two ellipses"; the diameter of the space enclosed is 100 ft.; the stones are from 13 ft. to 28 ft. high; is generally regarded as an exceptional development of the ordinary stone circle, but the special purpose of its unusual construction is still a matter of uncertainty.

STONYHURST, a celebrated Roman Catholic college in East Lancashire, 10 m. N. of Blackburn; established in 1794 by certain Jesuit fathers who, after the suppression of their seminary at St. Omer, in France, by the Bourbons, took up their residence at Bruges and then at Liège, but fled thence to England during the Revolution, and accepted the shelter offered them at Stonyhurst by Mr. Weld of Lulworth; there are several hundreds of students, and upwards of 30 masters; a preparatory school has been established at Hodder, a mile distant; in 1840 was affiliated to the University of London, for the degrees of which its students are chiefly trained; retains in its various institutions many marks of its French origin.

STOOL-BALL, an old-time sport which survives in Sussex, where it is a popular pastime for girls; is a primitive form of cricket, the bat having a short handle and a short, broad blade, and the wicket being an upright stick with a square of wood at top.

SUBMARINES, fighting vessels able to move out of sight under water; their chief weapon is the torpedo, and they are guided by means of a periscope. The first British submarine was launched in 1901, and they were used extensively in the Great War, particularly by Germany, in a ruthless campaign against enemy and neutral shipping. Experiments in submarine navigation were made in the 18th century, but the modern type has been evolved from Nordflet's vessel of 1887 and those constructed by Goulet and Zédé in France in 1888 and 1890. See FULTON.

SUBSTITUTION, in theology the doctrine that Christ in His obedience and death stood in the place of the sinner, so that His merits on their faith in Him are imputed to them.

SUBTLE DOCTOR, name given to Duns Scotus (q.v.) for his hairsplitting acuteness and extreme subtlety of distinction.

SUCCESSION WARS, the general title of several European wars which arose in the 18th century consequent on a failure of issue in certain royal lines, most important of which are (1) War of the Spanish Succession (1701-1713). The death (1700) of Charles II. of Spain without direct issue caused Louis XIV. of France and the Emperor Leopold I. (the former married to the elder sister of Charles, the latter to the younger sister, and both grandsons of Philip III. of Spain) to put forth claims to the crown, the one on behalf of his grandson, Philip of Anjou, the other for his second son, the Archduke Charles. War broke out on the entry of Philip into Madrid and his assumption of the crown, England and the United Netherlands uniting with the emperor to curb the ambition of Louis. During the long struggle the transcendent military genius of Marlborough asserted itself in the great victories of Blenheim, Ramillies, and Oudenarde, but the hawkwariness of England in the struggle, the political fall of Marlborough, and the Tory vote for peace prevented the allies from reaping the full benefit of their successes. The Treaty of Utrecht left Philip in possession of his Spanish kingdom, but the condition was exacted that the crowns of Spain and France should not be united. The emperor (the Archduke Charles since 1711) attempted to carry on the struggle, but was forced to sign the Treaty of Rastadt (1714), acknowledging Philip king of Spain. Spain, however, ceded her Netherlands, Sardinia, &c., to the emperor, while Gibraltar, Minorca, and parts of North America fell to England. (2) War of the Austrian Succession (1740-1748) followed on the death (1740) of the Emperor Charles VI. without male issue. His daughter, Maria Theresa, entered into possession of Bohemia, Hungary, and the Archduchy of Austria, but was immediately attacked by the Elector Charles Albert of Bavaria and Augustus of Saxony and Poland, both rival claimants for the imperial crown, while Frederick II. of Prussia seized the opportunity of Maria's embarrassment to annex Silesia. France, Spain, and England were drawn into the struggle, the last in support of Maria. Success oscillated from side to side, but the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which brought the war to a close, left Maria pretty well in possession of her inheritance save the loss of Silesia to Frederick.

SUCHET, LOUIS GABRIEL, DUC D'ALSUFERA, marshal of France, born in Lyons; distinguished himself in Italy, Egypt, Austria, and Prussia, and became general in command in Aragon, by his success in ruling which he gained the marshal's baton and a dukedom; he rejoined Napoleon during the Hundred Days; after Waterloo he lost his peerage, but recovered it in 1819 (1770-1826).

SUCKLING, SIR JOHN, poet, born, of good parentage, in Whitchin, Middlesex; quitted Cambridge in 1628 of travel on the Continent, and for a time served in the army of Gustavus Adolphus in Germany; returning to England about 1632, he became a favourite at Court, where he was noted for his wit, proclivity, and verses, supported Charles in the Bishops' Wars against the Scots; sat in the Long Parliament; was involved in a plot to rescue Strafford, and to bring foreign troops to the aid of the king, but, discovered, had to flee the country; died, probably by his own hand, in Paris; wrote several forgotten plays, a prose treatise on "Religion by Reason," and miscellaneous poems, amongst which are his charming songs and ballads, his title to fame (1609-1642).

SUE, MARIE-JOSEPH-EUGÈNE, a writer of sensational novels, born in Paris, was for some years an army surgeon, and served in the Spanish campaign of 1823; his father's death (1829) bringing him a handsome fortune, he retired from the army to devote himself to literature, his reputation as a writer rests mainly on his well-known works "The Mysteries of Paris" (1842) and "The Wandering Jew" (1845), which, displaying little skill on the artistic side, yet rivet their readers' attention by a wealth of exciting incident and plot; was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1850, but the coup d'état of 1852 drove him an exile to Annecy, in Savoy, where he died (1804-1859).

SUETONIUS, TRANQUILLUS, Roman historian; practised as an advocate in Rome in the reign of Trajan; was a friend of the Younger Pliny, became private secretary to Hadrian, but was deprived of this post through an indiscretion; wrote several works, and of those extant the chief is the "Lives of the Twelve Cæsar," beginning with Julius Cæsar and ending with Domitian, a work which relates a great number of anecdotes illustrating the characters of the emperors (c. 75-160).

SUEZ, a town of Egypt, stands at the edge of the desert at the head of a gulf of the same name and at the S. end of the Suez Canal, 75 m. E. of Cairo, with which it is connected by railway; as a trading place, dating back to the times of the Ptolemies, has had a fluctuating prosperity, but since the completion of the canal is growing steadily in importance; is still for the most part an ill-built and ill-kept town; has a large English hospital and ship-stores.

SUEZ CANAL, a great artificial channel cutting the isthmus of Suez, and thus forming a waterway between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea; was planned and undertaken by the French engineer Lesseps, through whose untiring efforts a company was formed and the necessary capital raised; occupied 10 years in the construction (1859-1869), and cost some 20 million pounds; from Port Said on the Mediterranean to Suez at the head of the Red Sea the length is about 100 m., a portion of which lies through Lakes Menzaleh, Ballah, Timah, and the Bitter Lakes; as widened and deepened in 1886 it has a minimum depth of 28 ft., and varies from 150 to 300 ft. in width; traffic is facilitated by electric light during the night, and the passage occupies little more than 24 hours; has been neutralised and exempted from blockade, vessels of all nations in peace or war being free to pass through; now the highway to India and the East, shortening the voyage to India by 7600 m.; three-fourths of the ships passing through are English; an annual toll is drawn of close on three million pounds, the net profit of which falls to be divided amongst the shareholders, of whom since 1875 the British Government has been one of the largest. The Canal was attacked by the Turks in January, 1916, during the Great War.

SUFFOLK, easternmost county of England, fronts the North Sea between Norfolk (N.) and Essex (S.); is a pleasant, undulating county with pretty woods and a fast-flowing stream (Waveney, Ake, Orwell, Bourn, &c.), long tracts of heathland skirt the coast; agriculture is still the staple industry, wheat the principal crop; is famed for its antiquities, architecture, historic associations, and long list of worthies. Ipswich is the county town.

SUFFRAGETTES, feminists who agitated early this century for the extension of the franchise in England to women. Led by the Women's Social and Political Union, and the Pankhursts (q.v.), they tried militant methods when peaceful ones failed; Aquilith was publicly assaulted, an attempt was made to stop the Derby, women chained themselves up in public places, and pillar-boxes were destroyed. Several leaders were imprisoned and went on hunger strike. The Great War put an end to the campaign.

SUFFREN, BAILLI DE, a celebrated French admiral, who entered the navy, a boy of 14, during the wars with England, and rose to be one of his country's greatest naval heroes, especially distinguishing himself as commander of a squadron in the West Indies, proving himself a master of naval tactics in more or less successful engagements with the English; is regarded by Professor Laughton as "the most illustrious officer that has ever held command in the French navy"; sprang from good Provence stock (C. 1748).

SUFISM, the doctrine of the Sufis, a sect of Mohammedan mystics; imported into Mohammedanism the idea that the soul is the subject of ecstasies of Divine inspiration in virtue of its direct emanation from the Deity, and this in the teeth of the fundamental article of the Mohammedan creed, which exalts God as a being possessing all comprehension and ruling it by a law which is equally mysterious, which we have only to obey; this doctrine is associated with the idea that the body is the soul's prison, and death the return of it to its original home, a doctrine of the dervish fraternity, of which the Mahdi is high-priest.

SUGER, ABBÉ, abbot of St. Denis, minister of Louis VI. and Louis VII.; reformed the discipline in his abbey, emancipated the serfs connected with it, maintained the authority of the king against the great vassals; he was regent of the kingdom during the second Crusade, and earned the title of Father of his Country; he wrote a Life of Louis VI. (1082-1152).

After 1919 it existed for a time to enforce the Peace treaties.

SURABAYA, a seaport on the N.E. coast of Java, is the headquarters of the Dutch military, and exports tropical products.

SURAT, a city of India, Bombay Presidency, on the Tapti, 14 m. from its entrance into the Gulf of Bombay; stretches along the S. bank of the river, presenting no architectural features of interest save some Mohammedan, Parsee, and Hindu temples, and an old castle or fortress, chief exports are cotton and grain; the English erected here their first factory on the Indian continent in 1612, and, with Portuguese and Dutch traders added, it became one of the principal commercial centres of India; in the 18th century the removal of the English East India Company to Bombay drew off a considerable portion of the trade of Surat, which it has never recovered.

SURCOUF, ROBERT, a French privateer, born in St. Malo, who figured in several notable exploits, capturing the British vessels Tridon and Kent in 1785 and 1800 (1773-1827).

SURGEONS, ROYAL COLLEGE OF, formed in 1800 and chartered in 1843, has its headquarters in Lincoln's Inn Fields, London; it was built in 1813 and contains the famous Hunterian Museum. The College is the successor of a surgical guild dating back to the 14th century.

SURINAM. See GUAYANA, DUTCH.

SURPLICE, a linen robe with wide sleeves worn by officiating clergymen and choristers, originating in the ruchet or alb of early times.

SURREY, an inland county, and one of the fairest of England, in the SE. between Kent (E.) and Hampshire (W.), with Sussex on the S., separated from Middlesex on the N. by the Thames; the North Downs traverse the county E. and W., slope gently to the Thames, and precipitously in the S. to the level Weald; generally presents a beautiful prospect of hill and heather-land adorned with splendid woods; the Wey and the Mole are the principal streams; hops are extensively grown round Farnham; largest town is Croydon; the county town is Kingston-on-Thames, but the assizes are held at Guildford.

SURREY, HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF, poet, son of the Duke of Norfolk; early attached to the court of Henry VIII., he attended his royal master at the "Field of the Cloth of Gold," and took part in the coronation ceremony of Anne Boleyn (1533); was created a Knight of the Garter in 1542, and two years later led the English army in France with varying success; imprisoned along with his father on a charge of high treason, for which there was no adequate evidence, he was condemned and executed; as one of the early leaders of the poetic renaissance, and introducer of the sonnet and originator of blank verse, he deservedly holds a high place in the history of English literature (1516-1547).

SURYA, in the Hindu mythology the sun conceived of as a female deity.

SUSA (the Shushan of Daniel, Esther, &c.), an ancient city of Persia, now in ruins, that spread over an area of 3 sq. m., on the Kerkha, 250 m. SE. of Bagdad; was for long the favourite residence of the Persian kings, the ruins of whose famous palace, described in Esther, are still extant.

SUSAN, ST., the patron saint and guardian of innocence and saviour from infamy and reproach. See SUSANNA.

SUSANNA, THE HISTORY OF, a story in the Apocrypha, evidently conceived to glorify Daniel as a judge, and apparently originally written by a Jew in Greek. She had been accused of adultery by two of the elders and condemned to death, but was acquitted on Daniel's examination of her accusers to their confusion and condemnation to death in her stead. The story has been aliorized by the Church, and Susanna made to represent the Church, and the two elders her persecutors.

SUSQUEHANNA, a river of America, formed by the junction at Northumberland, Pennsylvania, of the North Branch (350 m.) flowing out of Schuylers Lake, central New York, and the West Branch (250 m.) rising in the Alleghany Mountains; flows in a shallow, rapid, partly navigable course S. and SE. through beautiful scenery to Fort Deposit, at the N. end of Chesapeake Bay; length, 350 m.

SUSSEX, a S. maritime county of England, fronts the English Channel between Hampshire (W.) and Kent (E.), with Surrey on its northern border; is traversed E. and W. by the South Downs, which afford splendid pasturage for half a million sheep, and terminate in Beachy Head; in the N. lies the wide, fertile, and richly-wooded plain of the Weald, chief rivers are the Arun, Adur, Ouse, and Rother, of no great size; is a fine agricultural county, more than two-thirds of its area being under cultivation; was the scene of Caesar's landing (55 B.C.), of Ella's, the leader of the South Saxons (whence the name Sussex), and of William the Conqueror's (1066); throughout the county are interesting antiquities, largest town, Brighton; county town, Lewes.

SUTHERLAND, a maritime county of N. Scotland, presents a N. and a W. shore to the Atlantic, between Ross and Cromarty (S.) and Caithness (E.), and faces the North Sea on the SE., whence the land slopes upwards to the great mountain region and wild, precipitous loch-indented coasts of the W. and N.; scarcely 3 per cent. of the area is cultivated, but large numbers of sheep and cattle are raised; the Oykel is the longest (35 m.) of many streams, and Loch Shin the largest of 300 lochs; there are extensive deer forests and grouse moors, while valuable salmon and herring fisheries exist round the coasts; is the most sparsely populated county in Scotland; Dornoch is the county town.

SUTLEJ, the easternmost of the five rivers of the Punjab; its head-waters flow from two Tibetan lakes at an elevation of 15,200 ft., whence it turns NW. and W. to break through a wild gorge of the Himalayas, thence bends to the SW., forms the eastern boundary of the Punjab, and joins the Indus at Mithankot after a course of 900 m.

SUTRAS, name given to a collection of aphorisms, summaries of the teachings of the Brahmins, and of rules regulative of ritual or religious observances, and also given to these aphorisms and rules themselves.

SUTRO, ALFRED, British playwright, chiefly famous for "The Walls of Jericho," "John Gladys's Honour," and his translations of Masterlinck (1841).

SUTTEE, a Hindu widow who immolates herself on the funeral pile of her husband, a term applied to the practice itself. The practice was of very ancient date, but the custom was proclaimed illegal in 1829 under Lord William Bentinck's administration, and it is now very seldom that a widow seeks to violate the law. In 1823, in Bengal alone, 575 widows gave themselves to be so burned, of whom 109 were above sixty, 226 above forty, 209 above twenty, and 32 under twenty.

SUTTON, a town in Surrey 11 m. S. of London, of which it is virtually a suburb. The place is mentioned in the Domesday Book, and in modern times grew in importance on account of its being on the Brighton main road.

SUVLA BAY, the bay of Gallipoli on W. side of the Dardanelles, where British troops under the command of Sir F. W. Stopford landed in August, 1915.

SUWARROW, or SUVOROFF, ALEXANDER VASILEVITCH, Russian field-marshal, born in Moscow; entered the army as a private soldier, distinguished himself in the Seven Years' War, and after 20 years' service rose to command; in command of a division he in 1773 routed an army of the Turks beyond the Danube, and in 1783 he reduced a tribe of Tartars under the Russian yoke; his greatest exploit perhaps was his storming of Ismail, which had resisted all attempts to reduce it for seven months, and which he, but with revolting barbarities, took in three days, mainly by an indiscriminate massacre of 40,000 of the inhabitants; he after this conducted a cruel campaign in Poland, which ended in its partition, and a campaign in Italy to the disaster of the French and his elevation to the peerage as a prince, with the title of Italinski; he was all along the agent of the ruthless purposes of Potemkin (q.v.) (1729-1800).

SVENSBORG, a strong fortress in Finland, protecting Helsinki, in the Baltic, 3 m. distant from that town, and called the "Gibraltar of the North."

SVERDRUP, OTTO, Norwegian Arctic explorer, born in Heligoland; accompanied Nansen in the Fram expedition to North Pole, 1895; led second expedition, 1898-1901, and made important discoveries (1865-).

SVIR, a Russian river that flows into Lake Ladoga.

SWABIA, an ancient duchy in the SW. of Germany, and most fertile part, so called from the Suevi, who in the 1st century displaced the aboriginal Celts; along with Bavaria, it formed the nucleus of the Fatherland, was separated by the Rhine from France and Switzerland, having for capital Augsburg, and is divided now into Württemberg, Bavaria, Baden, and Lichtenstein.

SWAHILI (i.e. coast people), a people of mixed Hantu and Arab stock occupying Zanzibar and the adjoining territory from nearly Mozambique to Mozambique; they are an enterprising race, and are dispersed as traders, hunters, carriers, &c., far and wide over Central Africa; their language is spoken freely throughout East Central Africa.

SWALE, a river in the North Riding of Yorkshire, uniting, after a course of 60 miles, with the Ure to form the Ouse.

SWAMMERDAM, JAN, a Dutch entomologist, born in Amsterdam, where he settled as a doctor, but turning with enthusiasm to the study of insect life, made important contributions to, and practically laid the foundations of, entomological science (1637-1680).

SWAN OF AVON, name given by Ben Jonson to Shakespeare.

SWAN OF MANTUA, name given to Virgil, as born in Mantua.

SWANSEA, a flourishing and progressive seaport of Glamorganshire, at the entrance of the Tawe into Swansea Bay; has a splendid harbour, some 60 acres of docks, a castle, old grammar-school, &c.; is the chief seat of the copper-smelting and of the tinplate manufacture of England, and exports the products of these works, as well as coal, zinc, and other minerals, in large quantities.

SWARAJISTS, a political party in India advocating national independence. The word "swara" means "government of self," and was originally used as an ethical term for self-control. Politically the term started in a presidential address of Dadabhai Naoroji to the Indian National Congress in 1906, but Gandhi was largely responsible for its adoption by the Indian native party in 1919, and the formation in 1923 of the Swarajist Party under the leadership of C. E. Das and Pandit Moti Lal Nehru. Complete independence became the party slogan, and non-co-operation with the British one of the methods of securing it.

SWATOW, a seaport of China, at the mouth of the Han, 225 m. E. of Canton; has large sugar-refineries, factories for bean-cake and grass-cloth; since the policy of "the open door" was adopted in 1867 has had a growing export trade.

SWAZILAND, a small South African native State to the E. of the Transvaal, of which in 1893 it became a dependency, retaining, however, its own laws and native chief; is mountainous, fertile, and rich in minerals; the Swazis are of Zulu stock, jealous of the Boers, and friendly to Britain.

SWEATING SICKNESS, an epidemic of extraordinary malignity which swept over Europe, and especially England, in the 15th and 16th centuries, attacking with equal virulence all classes and all ages, and carrying off enormous numbers of people; was characterized by a sharp sudden seizure, high fever, followed by a fetid perspiration; first appeared in England in 1485, and for the last time in 1551.

SWEATING SYSTEM, a term which began to be used about 1848 to describe an iniquitous system of sub-contracting in the tailoring trade. Orders from master-tailors were undertaken by sub-contractors, who themselves farmed the work out to needy workers, who made the articles in their own crowded and fetid homes, receiving "starvation wages." The term is now used in reference to all trades in cases where the conditions imposed by masters tend to grind the rate of payment down to a bare living wage and to subject the workers to insanitary surroundings by overcrowding, &c., and to unduly long hours. Kingsley's pamphlet, "Cheap Clothes and Nasty," and novel, "Alton Locke," did much to draw public attention to the evil. In 1890 an elaborate report by a committee of the House of Lords was published, and led in the following year to the passing of the Factory and Workshops Act and the Public Health Act, which have greatly mitigated the evil.

SWEDEN, a kingdom of Northern Europe, occupying the eastern portion of the great Scandinavian Peninsula, bounded W. by Norway, E. by Finland, Gulf of Bothnia, and the Baltic, and on the N. stretches across the Arctic Circle between Norway (NW.) and Russia (NE.), while its southern separated shores are washed by the Skagerrack, Kattegat, and Baltic. From the mountain-barrier of Norway the country slopes down in broad terrace-like plains to the sea, intersected by many useful rivers and diversified by numerous lakes, of which Lakes Wenner, Wetter, and Mälär (properly an arm of the sea) are the largest, and lying under forest to the extent of nearly one-half its area; is divided into three great divisions: (1) Norrland in the N., a wide and wild tract of mountainous country, thickly forested, infested by the wolf, bear, and lynx, in summer the home of the wood-outter, and sparsely inhabited by Lapps; (2) Svealand or Sweden proper occupies the centre, and is the region of the great lakes and of the principal mineral wealth (iron, copper, &c.) of the country; (3) Gothland, the southern portion, embraces the fertile plains sloping to the Kattegat, and is the chief agricultural district, besides possessing iron and coal. Climate is fairly dry, with a warm summer and long, cold winter. Agriculture (potatoes, grain, rye, beet), although scarcely 8 per cent. of the land is under cultivation, is the principal industry, and with dairy-farming, stock-raising, &c., gives employment to more than one-half of the people; mining and timber-felling are only less important; chief industries are iron-works, sugar-refineries, cotton-mills, &c.; principal exports timber (much the largest), iron, steel, and butter, while textiles and dry-goods are the chiefly needed imports. Transit is greatly facilitated by the numerous canals and by the rivers and lakes. Railways and telegraphs are well developed in proportion to the population. As in Norway, the national religion is Lutheranism; education is free and compulsory. Government is vested in the king, who with the advice of a council controls the executive, and two legislative chambers which have equal powers, but the members of the one are elected for nine years by provincial councils, while those of the other are elected by the suffrages of the people, receive salaries, and sit only for three years. In the 14th century the country became an appanage of the Danish crown, and continued as such until freedom was again won in the 16th century by the patriot king, Gustavus Vasa. By the 17th century had extended her rule across the seas into certain portions of the empire, but selling there in the beginning of the 18th century, fell from her rank as a first-rate power. In 1814 Norway was annexed, the two countries, each enjoying complete autonomy, but the union was dissolved in 1905, and Norway became independent.

SWEDENBORG, EMMANUEL, a mystic of the mystics, founder of the "New Church," born in Stockholm, son of a bishop, a boy of extraordinary gifts and natural seriousness of mind; carefully educated under his father, attended the university of Upsala and took his degree in philosophy in 1709; in eager quest of knowledge visited England, Holland, France, and Germany; on his return, after four years, was at 28 appointed by Charles XII. assessor of the Royal College of Mines; in 1721 went to examine the mines and smelting-works of Europe; from 1716 spent 20 years in the composition and publication of scientific works, when of a sudden he threw himself into theology; in 1743 his period of illumination began, followed by the publication of many theological treatises; the Swedish clergy interfered a little with the publication of his works, but he kept the friendship of people in power. He was never married, his habits were simple, he lived on bread, milk, and vegetables, and occupied a house situated in a large garden; visited England several times, but attracted no attention; died in London of apoplexy in his eighty-fifth year. He is described, in London, as "a man of quiet, clerical habit, not averse to tea and coffee, and kind to children. He wore a sword when in full velvet dress, and whenever he walked out carried a gold-headed cane." This is Emerson's account in brief of his outer man, but for a glimpse or two of his ways of thinking and his views the reader is referred to Emerson's "Representative Men." The man was a seer: what he saw only himself could tell, and only those could see, he would say, who had the power of transporting themselves into the same spiritual centre; to him the only real world was the spirit-world and the world of sense only in as far as it reflected to the soul the great invisible (1688-1772).

SWEDENBORGIANs, the members of the "New Jerusalem Church," founded on the teaching of Emmanuel Swedenborg (q.v.) on a belief in direct communion with the world of spirits, and in God as properly incarnate in the divine humanity of Christ.

SWEDISH NIGHTINGALE, name popularly given to Jenny Lind (q.v.).

SWERGA, or SVARGA, the summit of Mount Meru, the Hindu Olympus, the heaven or abode of Indra (q.v.) and of the gods in general.

SWETCHINE, MADAME, a Russian lady, Anne Sophie Soymanoff, born in Moscow, who married General Swetchine, and, after turning Catholic, became celebrated in Paris during 1817-1851 as the gracious hostess of a salon where much religious and ethical discussion went on; plain and unimposing in appearance, she yet exercised a remarkable fascination over her "coterie" by the elevation of her character and eager spiritual nature (1782-1857).

SWEYN, King of Denmark and father of Canute the Great. By nature a fighter, he conquered parts of Norway and Sweden, and his raids on the British coast were so successful that Ethelred the Unready paid him tribute. He died in 1014 at Gainborough, Lincolnshire, after conquering large tracts of England.

SWIFT, JONATHAN, born in Dublin, a posthumous son, of well-connected parents; educated at Kilkenny, where he had Congreve for companion, and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he was a somewhat riotous and a by no means studious undergraduate, only receiving his B.A. by "special grace" in 1686; two years later the Revolution drove him to England; became amanuensis to his mother's distinguished relative Sir William Temple, whose service, however, was uncongenial to his proud independent nature, and after taking a Master's degree at Oxford he returned to Dublin, took orders, and was presented to the canonry of Kilroot, near Belfast; the quiet of country life palling upon him, he was glad to resume secretarial service in Temple's household (1696), where during the next three years he remained, mastering the craft of politics, reading enormously, and falling in love with Stella (q.v.); was set adrift by Temple's death in 1699, but shortly afterwards became secretary to Lord Berkeley, one of the Lord-Deputies to Ireland, and was soon settled in the vicarage of Laracor, West Meath; in 1704 appeared anonymously his famous satires, the "Battle of the Books" and the "Tale of a Tub," masterpieces of English prose; various squibs and pamphlets, followed; "On the Inconvenience of Abolishing Christianity," &c.; but politics more and more engaged his attention; being neglected by the Whigs and hating their war policy, he turned Tory, attacked with deadly effect, during his editorship of the Examiner (1710-1711), the war party and its leader Marlborough, crushed Steele's defence in his "Public Spirit of the Whigs," and after the publication of "The Conduct of the Allies" stood easily the foremost political writer of his time; disappointed of an English bishopric, in 1713 reluctantly accepted the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin, a position he held until the close of his life; became loved in the country he despised by eloquently voicing the wrongs of Ireland in a series of tracts, "Drapier's Letters," &c., fruitful of good results; crowned his great reputation by the publication (1726) of his masterpiece "Gulliver's Travels," the most daring, savage, and amusing satire contained in the world's literature; "Stella's" death and the slow progress of a brain disease, ending in insanity, cast an ever-deepening gloom over his later years (1667-1745).

SWILLY, LOUGH, a narrow inlet of the Atlantic, on the coast of Donegal, North Ireland, running in between Dunaff Head (E.) and Fanad Point (W.), a distance of 25 m.; is from 3 to 4 m. broad; the entrance is fortified.

SWINBURNE, ALGERNON CHARLES, poet and prose writer, born in London, son of Admiral Swinburne; educated at Balliol College, Oxford, went to Florence and spent some time there; his first productions were plays, two of them tragedies, and "Poems and Ballads," his later "A Song of Italy," essay on "William Blake," and "Songs before Sunrise" instinct with pantheistic and republican ideas, besides "Studies in Song," "Studies in Prose and Poetry," &c.; he ranks as the successor of Landor, of whom he was a great admirer, stood high both as a poet and a critic, and was a man of broad and generous sympathies (1837-1909).

SWINDON, a town in Wiltshire, 77 m. W. of London; contains the Great Western Railway Company's engineering works, which cover 200 acres and employ 10,000 men.

SWINEMUNDE, a fortified seaport on the island of Usedom, in the Baltic, near the mouth of the Swine, one of the outlets of the Oder.

SWISS CONFEDERATION, a league of the several Swiss cantons to resist, on attempt on the part of the Emperor Albrecht to incorporate certain of the free towns into his family possessions.

SWISS GUARDS. See GARDES SUISSES.

SWITHIN, ST., bishop of Winchester from 852 to 862; was buried by his own request in Winchester Churchyard, "where passers-by might tread above his head, and the dews of heaven fall on his grave." On his canonisation, a century after, the chapter resolved to remove his body to a shrine in the cathedral, but their purpose was hindered on account of a rain which lasted 40 days from July 15; hence the popular notion that if it rained that day it would be followed by rain for 40 days after.

SWITZERLAND, a republic of Central Europe, bounded by Germany (N.), France (W.), Italy (S.), and Austria and Germany (E.); in size is slightly more than one-half of Scotland, of semicircular shape, having the Jura Alps on its French border, and divided from Italy by the great central ranges of the Alpine system, whence radiate the Swiss Alps—Pennine, Lepontine, Bernese, &c.—covering the E. and S., and occupying with intervening valleys two-thirds of the country; the remaining third is occupied by an elevated fertile plain, extending between Lakes of Constance and Geneva (largest of numerous lakes), and studded with picturesque hills; principal rivers are the Upper Rhone, the Aar, Ticino, and Inn; climate varies with the elevation, from the high regions of perpetual snow to warm valleys where ripen the vine, fig, almond, and olive; about one-third of the land surface is under forest, and one-quarter arable, the grain grown forming only one-half of what is required; flourishing dairy farms exist, prospered by the fine meadows and mountain pastures which, together with the forests, comprise the country's greatest wealth; minerals are exceedingly scarce, coal being entirely absent. Despite its restricted arable area and lack of minerals the country has attained a high pitch of prosperity through the thrift and energy of its people, who have skillfully utilised the inexhaustible motive-power of innumerable waterfalls and mountain streams to drive great factories of silks, cottons, watches, and jewellery. The beauty of its mountain, lake, and river scenery has long made Switzerland the sanatorium and recreation ground of Europe; more than 600 health resorts exist, and the country has been described as one vast hotel. The Alpine barriers are crossed by splendid roads and railways, the great tunnels through St. Gothard and the Simplon being triumphs of engineering skill and enterprise. In 1848, after the suppression of the Sonderbund (q.v.), the existing league of 22 semi-independent States (constituting since 1798 the Helvetic Republic) formed a closer federal union, and a constitution (issued in 1874) was drawn up conserving as far as possible the distinctive laws of the cantons and local institutions of their communes. The President is elected annually by the Federal Assembly (which consists of two chambers constituting the legislative power), and is assisted in the executive government by a Federal Council of seven members. By an institution known as the "Referendum" all legislative acts passed in the Cantonal or Federal Assemblies may under certain conditions be referred to the mass of the electors, and this is frequently done. The national army is maintained by conscription: 71 per cent. of the people speak German, 22 per cent. French, and 6 per cent. Italian; 69 per cent. are Protestants, and 41 per cent. Catholics. Education is splendidly organised, free, and compulsory; there are five universities, and many fine technical schools.

SYBARIS, an ancient city of Magna Græcia, on the Gulf of Tarentum, flourished in the 17th century B.C., but in 510 B.C. was captured and totally obliterated by the rival colonists of Crotona; at the height of its prosperity the luxury and voluptuousness of the inhabitants was such as to become a byword throughout the ancient world, and henceforth a Sybarite city is a city of luxurious indulgence, and Sybarite a devotee of pleasure.

SYBEL, HEINRICH VON, German historian, born in Düsseldorf; was a pupil of Ranke, and became professor of History at Munich and Bonn; he was a Liberal in politics; his great works are a "History of the Period of the French Revolution from 1789 to 1795, and then to 1800," in five volumes, and the "History of the Founding of the German Empire under William I.," in five volumes; he also wrote a "History of the First Crusade" (1817-1895).

SYELL, a novel with a political background, written by Benjamin Disraeli and published in 1845.

SYCORAX, a hag in the "Tempest," the dam of Caliban.

SYDENHAM, a district of Kent and suburb of London, to the S.E. of which it lies 7 m., where in 1662-1664 the Crystal Palace was erected and still stands, a far-famed sight of London, containing valuable collections illustrative of the arts and sciences, and surrounded by a park and gardens.

SYDENHAM, 1ST BARON (Charles Edward Poulett Thomson), British politician. Born in London, he spent several years in business, before becoming M.P. for Dover in 1826; in 1834 he became President of the Board of Trade, and in 1839 Governor-General of Canada, where he took an active part in centralising government and unifying the country; raised to the peerage in 1840, he died the following year as the result of a riding accident (1799-1841).

SYDENHAM, FLOYER, Greek scholar; translated some of the Dialogues of Plato into English, and wrote a dissertation on Heraclitus, which failed of being appreciated, and involved in embarrassment he was thrown into prison because he could not pay a small bill for provisions, and there died; his end fate led to the foundation of the Literary Fund (1710-1787).

SYDENHAM, THOMAS, the "English Hippocrates," born in Dorsetshire, educated at Oxford, and a Fellow of All Souls; practised medicine in London, where, though regarded with disfavour by the faculty, he stood in high regard, and had an extensive practice, from his study of the symptoms of disease, and the respect he paid to the constitution of the patient; he used his own sense and judgment in each case, and his treatment was uniformly successful; he commanded the regard of his contemporaries Locke and Boyle, and his memory was revered by such experts as Boerhaave, Stahl, Pinel, and Haller; he ranks as a great reformer in the healing art (1624-1689).

SYDNEY, the capital of New South Wales, the oldest and largest city in Australia, is situated on one of the most beautiful harbours (Port Jackson) in the world. The harbour bridge is one of the largest engineering schemes of its kind ever undertaken, and links up the north and south shores. The city contains many very fine buildings, including the university, art gallery, museum, two cathedrals, libraries, and hospitals. Its manufactures are numerous and its commercial interests very large. It is a very important railway centre, and the extensive and modern plant for dealing with shipping and storing and loading grain in bulk is second to none in the southern hemisphere. A city underground electric railway is in course of construction at an estimated cost of £10,000,000.

SYLLOGISM, an argument consisting of three propositions, of which two are called premises, major and minor, and the one that necessarily follows from them the conclusion.

SYLPHS, elemental spirits of the air, as salamanders are of fire, of light figure with gliding movements and protective power.

SYLT, one of the N. Frisian Islands in Sleswig-Holstein, 22 m. in length and under half a mile wide in most places; the chief village is Westerland, in the middle of the island, while there are good harbours at both ends; it is a popular holiday resort for Germans.

SYLVESTER, JAMES JOSEPH, British mathematician. Born in London, he was educated at Liverpool and Cambridge, where he was second wrangler in 1837; he lectured most of his life, being successively professor at University College, London, Virginia University, U.S.A., the Woolwich Royal Military Academy, Baltimore University, and finally Oxford, where he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry (1814-1897).

SYLVESTER, ST., the name of three Popes: S. I., Pope from 314 to 336; S. II., Pope from 990 to 1003, alleged, from his recalcitrant knowledge as an alchemist, to have been in league with the devil; and S. III., anti-Pope from 1041 to 1046.

SYLVESTER, ST., the first Pope of the name, said to have converted Constantine and his mother by restoring a dead ox to life which a magician for a trial of skill killed, but could not restore to life, is usually represented by an ox lying beside him, and sometimes as baptising Constantine.

SYMBIOSIS, name given to the relation between two different organisms which live together to their mutual benefit.

SYMBOLISM has been divided into two kinds, symbolism of colour and symbolism of form. Of colours, black typifies grief and death; blue, hope, love of divine works, divine contemplation, piety, sincerity; pale blue, power; Christian prudence, love of good works, serene concordance; gold, glory and power; green, faith, immortality, resurrection, gladness; pale green, baptism; grey, tribulation; purple, justice, royalty; red, martyrdom for faith, charity, divine love; rose-colour, martyrdom; saffron, confession; scarlet, fervour and glory; silver, chastity and purity; violet, penitence; white, purity, temperance, innocence, charity, and faith in God. Instances of form: Anchor typifies hope; palm, victory; sword, death or martyrdom; the lamb, Christ, unicorn, purity. Of stones, moreover, the amethyst typifies humility; diamond, invulnerable faith, sardonyx, sincerity; sapphires, hope, &c.

SYME, JAMES, a great surgeon, born in Edinburgh; was demonstrator under Liston; was elected to the chair of Clinical Surgery in 1833; gave up the chair to succeed Liston in London in 1848, but returned a few months after; was re-elected to the chair he had vacated; he was much honoured by his pupils, and by none more than Dr. John Brown, who characterised him as "the best, ablest, and most beneficent of men"; he wrote treatises and papers on surgery (1790-1870).

SYMINGTON, WILLIAM, British inventor, devised an early form of steam engine for ships and for road locomotion (1783-1831).

SYMONDS, JOHN ADDINGTON, English man of letters, born in Bristol; educated at Harrow and Oxford; author of "The Renaissance in Italy," a work which shows an extensive knowledge of the subject, and is written in a finished but rather flowery style, and a number of other works of a kindred nature showing equal ability and literary skill; his translation of Benvenuto Cellini's autobiography is particularly noteworthy; was consumptive, and spent his later years at Davos, in the Engadine (1840-1893).

SYMPLAGADES, two fabulous floating rocks at the entrance of the Euxine, which, when driven by the winds, crushed every vessel that attempted to pass between them; the ship Argo (q.v.) managed to pass between them, but with the loss of part of her stern, after which they became fixed.

SYMPHONY, an elaborate orchestral composition consisting usually of four contrived and related movements; began to take distinctive shape in the 17th century, and was for long merely a form of overture to operas, &c., but as its possibilities were perceived was elevated into an independent concert-piece, and as such exercised the genius of Mozart and Haydn, reaching its perfection of form in the symphonies of Beethoven.

SYNAGOGUE, a Jewish institution for worship and religious instruction which dates from the period of the Babylonian captivity, especially to keep alive in the minds of the people a knowledge of the law. The decree ordaining it required the families of a district to meet twice every Sabbath for this purpose, and so religiously did the Jewish people observe it that it continues a characteristic ordinance of Judaism to this day. The study of the law became henceforth their one vocation, and the synagogue was instituted both to instruct them in it and to remind them of the purpose of their separate existence among the nations of the earth. High as the Temple and its service still stood in the esteem of every Jew, from the period of the captivity it began to be felt of secondary importance to the synagogue and its service. With the erection and extension of the latter the people were being slowly trained into a truer sense of the nature of religious worship, and gradually made to feel that to know the will of God and do it was a more genuine act of homage to Him than the offering of sacrifices upon an altar or the observance of any religious rite. Under such training the issue between the Jew and the Samaritan became of less and less consequence, and he and not the Samaritan was on the pathway which led direct to the final worship of God in spirit and in truth (John iv. 22).

SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT, the name given to a council at Jerusalem, consisting of 120 members, there assembled about the year 410 B.C. to give final form to the service and worship of the Jewish Church. A Jewish tradition says Moses received the law from Sinai; he transmitted it to Joshua, Joshua to the elders, the elders to the prophets, to the men of the Great Assembly, who added thereto these words: "Be circumspect in judgment, make many disciples, and set a hedge about the law." To them belong the final settlement and arrangement of the Jewish Scriptures, the introduction of a new alphabet, the regulation of the synagogue worship, and the adoption of sundry liturgical forms, as well as the establishment of the Feast of Purim (q.v.), and probably the "schools" of the Scribes.

SYNCPATION, a musical term denoting an alteration of accent by means of prolonging a sound from a weak place in the bar to a stronger one. The practice became popular in America, and was introduced into England about the time of the Great War, when it became the basis of subsequent dance music.

TANEY, EGOR BROOKE, American jurist. Born in Maryland, the son of a planter, he took to law, and in 1816 was elected to the senate of Maryland, in which capacity he was one of the earliest opponents of slavery; in 1831 he became Attorney-General of the United States, and two years later secretary of the treasury; he became Chief Justice in 1836 (1777-1864).

TANGANYIKA, a lake of East Central Africa, stretching between the Congo Free State (W.) and German East Africa (E.); discovered by Speke and Burton in 1858; more carefully explored by Livingstone and Stanley in 1871; the overflow is carried off by the Lukura into the Upper Congo; is skirted by lofty mountains; length 420 m., breadth from 15 to 80 m.

TANGANYIKA TERRITORY, is the name now borne by what was German East Africa. It has an area of 384,079 sq. m. Within its borders is Kilimanjaro, 19,321 ft., the highest mountain in Africa.

TANGIER, or TANGIERS, a seaport of Morocco, on a small bay of the Strait of Gibraltar; occupies a picturesque site on two hills, but within its old walls presents a dirty and crowded appearance; has a considerable shipping trade; was a British possession from 1662 to 1683, but was abandoned, and subsequently became infested by pirates. It is internationalised, being outside both the French and Spanish zones.

TANIS, an ancient city of Egypt, whose ruins mark its site on the N.E. of the Nile delta; once the commercial metropolis of Egypt, and a royal residence; fell into decay owing to the silting up of the Tanitic mouth of the Nile, and was destroyed in A.D. 174 for rebellion.

TANIST STONE, monolith erected by the Celts on a coronation, agreeably to an ancient custom (Judges ix. 6).

TANISTRY, a method of tenure which prevailed among the Gaelic Celts; according to this custom succession, whether in office or land, was determined by the family as a whole, who on the death of one holder elected another from its number; the practice was designed probably to prevent family estates falling into the hands of an incompetent or worthless heir.

TANJORE, capital of a district of the same name in Madras Province, India, situated in a fertile plain 180 m. SW. of Madras, and about 45 m. from the sea; surrounded by walls; contains a rajah's palace, a British residency, and manufactures silk, muslin, and cotton.

TANKS, a form of armoured car introduced in the Great War capable of negotiating uneven country, and knocking down such natural obstacles as trees. Britain was the first to invent the tank, and put them into action in September, 1916, on the Somme to end the deadlock of trench warfare. The original tanks were heavy machines, but later light tanks were invented. The Tank Corps was formed in March, 1916.

TANMARILL, ROBERT, Scottish poet, born in Paisley; the son of a weaver, was bred to the handloom, and, with the exception of a two years' residence in Lancashire, passed his life in his native town; an enthusiastic admirer of Burns, Ferguson, and Ramsay, he soon began to emulate them, and in 1807 published a volume of "Poems and Songs," which, containing such songs as "Gloomy Winter's noo Awa," "Jemie the Flower o' Dunblane," "The Wood o' Craigielea," &c., proved an immediate success; disappointment at the rejection by Constable of his proffered MS. of a new and enlarged edition of his works and a sense of failing health led to his committing suicide in a canal near Paisley; his songs are marked by tenderness and grace, but lack the force and passion of Burns (1774-1810).

TANNENBERG, a village in East Prussia where in August, 1914, the Germans gained an important victory over the Russians. Hindenburg and Ludendorff led the German forces and Samsouloff the Russians, and the battle proved one of the most decisive of the Great War, removing all possibility of a victory for the Allies on the Eastern Front.

TANNER, THOMAS, bishop and antiquary, born in Market Lavington, Wiltshire; became a graduate and Fellow of Oxford; took orders, and rose to be bishop of St. Asaph; his reputation as a learned and accurate antiquary rests on his two great works "Notitia Monastica, or a Short Account of the Religious Houses in England and Wales," and "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," a veritable mine of biographical and bibliographical erudition; bequeathed valuable collections of charters, deeds, &c., to the Bodleian Library (1674-1736).

TANNAHAUSER, a knight of mediæval legend, who wins the affection of a lady, but leaves her to worship in the cave-palace of Venus, on learning which the lady plunges a dagger into her heart and dies; smitten with remorse he visits her grave, weeps over it, and hastens to Rome to confess his sin to Pope Urban; the Pope refuses absolution, and protests it is no more possible for him to receive pardon than for the dry wand in his hand to bud again and blossom; in his despair he flees from Rome, but is met by Venus, who lures him back to her cave, there to remain till the day of judgment; meanwhile the wand he left at Rome begins to put forth green leaves, and Urban, alarmed, sends off messengers in quest of the unhappy knight, but they fail to find him. The legend has been familiarised by Wagner's opera of the name.

TANNIN, an astringent substance found in gall-nuts and the bark of the oak, used in the manufacture of leather.

TANTALUS, in the Greek mythology a Lydian king, who, being admitted from blood relationship to the banquet of the gods, incurred their displeasure by betraying their secrets, and was consigned to the nether world and compelled to suffer the constant pangs of hunger and thirst, though he stood up to the chin in water, and had ever before him the offer of the richest fruits, both of which receded from him as he attempted to reach them, while a huge rock hung over him, ever threatening to fall and crush him with its weight.

TANTIA TOPEE, the most daring and stubborn of Nana Sahib's lieutenants during the Indian Mutiny; in alliance with the Rani of Jhansi he upheld for a time the mutiny after the flight of his chief, but was finally captured and executed in 1859.

TARDEU, ANDRÉ, French politician. Originally in the diplomatic service and attaché to the Berlin Embassy, he became professor of modern history at the School of Political Science, Paris, and afterwards at the French Army Staff College. He next took to journalism, being in turn dramatic critic, reviewer and political correspondent, and during the Great War he was given positions on the staff of Foch and Joffre, but transferred to a line regiment in the trenches where he was wounded and badly gassed. Politics became his main career after, and in 1929 he became Prime Minister (1876-).

TARE AND TRET, commercial terms, are deductions usually made from the gross weight of goods. Tare is the weight of the case or covering, box, or such-like, containing the goods; deducting this the net weight is left. Tret is a further allowance (not now so commonly deducted) made at the rate of 4 lb. for every 104 lb. for waste through dust, sand, &c.

TARENTUM. See TARANTO.

TARGOVICA or TARGOWICZ, a town in Russia in the government of Kieff; it was the scene in 1792 of a Polish plot to overthrow the constitution.

TARGUMS, translations, dating for the most part as early as the time of Ezra, of several books of the Old Testament into Aramaic, which both in Babylonia and Palestine had become the spoken language of the Jews instead of Hebrew, executed chiefly for the service of the Synagogue; they were more or less of a paraphrastic nature, and were accompanied with comments and instances in illustration; they were delivered at first orally and then handed down by tradition, which did not improve them. One of them, on the Pentateuch, bears the name of Onkelos, who sat at the feet of Gamaliel along with St. Paul, and another the name of Jonathan, in the historical and prophetic books, though there are others, the Jerusalem Targum and the Pseudo-Jonathan, which are of an inferior stamp and surcharged with fancies similar to those in the Talmud (q.v.).

TARIFA, an interesting old Spanish seaport, the most southerly town of Europe, 21 m. SW. of Gibraltar, derives its name from the Moorish leader Tariq, who occupied it 710 A.D.; held by the Moors for more than 500 years; still thoroughly Moorish in appearance, dingy, crowded, and surrounded by walls; is connected by causeway with the strongly-fortified isleta de Tarifa.

TARIFF, a duty imposed on goods imported from abroad. The idea underlying the system is to raise the price of imported articles, and so afford a margin to home producers to enable them to compete on better terms in the home market. Some tariffs, however, are designed not to give protection to home industries but to raise revenue; in England these include the duties on tobacco, wine, and tea.

TARIFF REFORM, an agitation started early this century by Joseph Chamberlain (q.v.) for a reversal of Britain's free trade policy and the imposition of protective duties on imported articles we could have produced at home, together with an encouragement of Empire trade by granting preferences. The Tariff Reform League was started in 1903, and in 1906 its proposals became part of the programme of the Conservative Party in the general election, when they were heavily defeated. In 1923 Baldwin sought to reverse that decision, but was also defeated in the constituencies.

TARNOPOLE, a town of Galicia, Poland, on the Sereth, 80 m. SE. of Lemberg; does a good trade in agricultural produce; inhabitants chiefly Jews.

Russian enterprise has done much for it, introducing schools, &c.; carries on a brisk trade, and manufactures silks, leather, and porcelain ware.

TASMAN, ABEL JANSZON, Dutch explorer, and the discoverer of the island later called Tasmania. He early took to the sea, and in 1642 was placed in command of an expedition sent out by Van Diemen, governor of the Dutch East India Company; in the course of that voyage he discovered Tasmania, New Zealand, and the Fiji Islands; in a second voyage in 1644 he discovered the Gulf of Carpentaria (circ. 1600-1659).

TASMAN SEA, the sea lying between the New Zealand group and Australia and Tasmania.

TASMANIA, an island and colony of Britain, lying fully 100 m. S. of Australia, from which it is separated by Bass Strait; about the size of Scotland; the beauty of its mountain and lake scenery has won it the name of "the Switzerland of the South"; extensive stretches of tableland diversified by lakes—largest Great Lake, 90 m. in circumference—occupy the centre; wide fertile valleys stretch down to the coastal plains, often richly wooded with lofty eucalyptus and various pine trees; rivers are numerous, and include the Derwent and Tamar, which form excellent waterways into the interior; enjoys a genial and temperate climate, more invigorating than that of Australia; sheep-farming and mining (coal in particular), and fruit-growing are the principal industries; gold, silver, and tin are also wrought; the flora, as also the fauna, is practically identical with that of Australia; has a long, irregular coastline, with many excellent harbours: chief exports are wool, tin, fruit, timber, coal, and gold; was discovered in 1642 by Tasman, a Dutchman, and first settled by Englishmen in 1803; the aborigines are now completely extinct; was till 1852 a penal settlement, and received representative government in 1855; is divided into 18 counties; government is conducted by a legislative council, a house of assembly, and a crown-appointed governor; most of the colonists belong to the Church of England; is well supplied with railways and telegraphs; was formerly called Van Diemen's Land after Van Diemen, the Dutch governor-general of Batavia, who despatched Tasman on his voyage of discovery.

TASSO, BERNARDO, an Italian poet of some repute in his own day, but now chiefly remembered as the father of the greater Torquato, born in Venice (1493-1569).

TASSO, TORQUATO, an illustrious Italian poet, son of preceding, born in Sorrento, near Naples; educated at a Jesuit school in Naples, he displayed unusual precocity, and subsequently studied law at the university of Padua, but, already devoted to poetry, at 18 published his first poem "Rinaldo," a romance in 12 cantos, the subject-matter of which is drawn from the Charlemagne legends; in 1600 he entered the service of Cardinal Luigi d'Este, by whom he was introduced to Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara, brother of the cardinal, within whose court he received the needful impulse to begin his great poem "La Gerusalemme Liberata"; for the court stage he wrote his pastoral play "Aminta," a work of high poetic accomplishment, which extended his popularity, and by 1575 his great epic was finished; in the following year the symptoms of mental disease revealed themselves, and after a confinement of a few days he fled from Ferrara, and for two years led the life of a wanderer, the victim of his own brooding and religious melancholy, passing on foot from city to city of Italy; yielding to a pent-up longing to revisit Ferrara he returned, but was coldly received by the duke, and after an outburst of frenzy placed in confinement for seven years; during these years the fame of his epic spread throughout Italy, and the interest created in its author eventually led to his liberation; in 1595 he was summoned by Pope Clement VIII., from a heartless and wandering life, to appear at Rome to be crowned upon the Capitol the poet-laureate of Italy, but, although he reached the city, his worn-out frame succumbed before the ceremony could take place. "One thing," says Settembrini, the literary historian of Italy, Tasso had, which few in his time possessed, a great heart, and that made him a true and great poet, and a most unhappy man"; Fairfax's translation of the "Jerusalem Delivered" is one of his great translations in the English language (1544-1595).

TATAR, a word derived from a Turanian root signifying "to pitch a tent," hence appropriate to nomadic tribes, became converted by European chroniclers into Tartar, a fanciful derivative from Tartarus (q.v. hell), and suggestive of fiends from hell. Tartary, as a geographical expression of the Middle Ages, embraced a vast stretch of territory from the Dnieper, in Eastern Europe, to the Sea of Japan; but subsequently dwindled away to Chinese and Western Turkestan.

TATE GALLERY, a British national art collection housed at Millbank, London, and named after Sir Henry Tate, who founded it in 1897, the building costing £100,000. Sir Joseph Duveen added a Turner wing in 1910.

TATE, NAHUM, poet laureate, born in Dublin, where he was educated at Trinity College; came to London to ply the craft of a writer, and in 1690 succeeded Shadwell in the laureateship; imprudent, and probably intemperate, he died in the Mint, the refuge of bankrupts in those days; wrote some dramatic pieces, but is to be remembered mainly for his metrical version of the Psalms, executed in conjunction with Nicholas Brady, which superseded the older version done by Sternhold (q.v.) and Hopkins (1652-1716).

His eldest son, Isaac, entered the Church, and rose to be rector of Settrington, in Yorkshire, and was collated to a canonry of York in 1885; had a wide reputation as a philologist, and was author of "Words and Places," and "The Alphabet, an Account of the Origin and Development of Letters," besides "Etruscan Researches" and "The Origin of the Aryans" (1829-1901).

TAYLOR, JEREMY, great English divine and preacher, born in Cambridge, son of a barber; educated at Caius College, became a Fellow of All Souls, Oxford; took orders; attracted the attention of Laud; was made chaplain to the king, and appointed to the living of Uppington; on the sequestration of his living in 1642 joined the King at Oxford, and adhered to the royal cause through the Civil War; suffered much privation, and imprisonment at times; returning to Wales, he procured the friendship and enjoyed the patronage of the Earl of Carberry, in whose mansion at Grove he wrote a number of his works; before the Restoration he received preferment in Ireland, and after that event was made bishop, first of Down and then of Dromore; his life here was far from a happy one, partly through insubordination in his diocese and partly through domestic sorrow; his works are numerous, but the principal are his "Liberty of Prophecy," "Holy Living and Holy Dying," "Life of Christ," "Ductor Dubitantium," a work on casuistry; he was a good man and a faithful, more a religious writer than a theological; his books are read more for their devotion than their divinity, and they all give evidence of luxuriance of imagination, to which the epithet "florid" has not inappropriately been applied; in Church matters he was a follower of Laud (1613-1667).

TAYLOR, JOHN, known as the "Water-Poet," born in Gloucester, was successively a waterman on the Thames, a sailor in the navy, and public-house keeper in Oxford, walked from London to Edinburgh, "not carrying any money to or for, neither begging, borrowing, or asking meat, drink, or lodging," and described the journey in his "Penultimate Pilgrimage"; wrote also "Travels in Germany," and enjoyed considerable repute in his time as a humorous rhymester (1580-1653).

TAYLOR, ROWLAND, a Protestant martyr of the 16th century. He was chaplain to Cranmer and vicar of Hadleigh, and under Queen Mary refused to renounce his faith, being burnt at the stake in 1555.

TAYLOR, TOM, a noted playwright and journalist, born in Sunderland, was elected to a Fellowship at Cambridge, for two years filled the chair of English Literature at University College, London; in 1845 was called to the bar, but shortly afterwards took to journalism, writing leaders for the Morning Chronicle and Daily News; during 1850-1872 held secretarial appointments to the Board of Health and in the Local Government Act Office; succeeded Shirley Brooks as editor of Punch in 1874; was throughout his life a prolific writer and adapter of plays, staging upwards of 100 pieces, of which the best known are "My Parents and Guardians," "Still Waters Run Deep," "Our American Cousin," and "The Ticket-of-Leave Man" (1817-1890).

TAYLOR, WILLIAM, literary historian and critic, born in Norwich, residence on the Continent enabled him to master French, Italian, and especially German, and confirmed him in his taste for literature, to pursue which he abandoned business; various essays and reviews formed the groundwork of his elaborate "Historic Survey of German Literature," the first systematic survey of German literature presented to English readers; taught German to George Borrow, who in "Lazarillo" sketched his interesting personality, which may be further studied in his correspondence with Southey, Scott, &c. (1765-1836).

TAYLOR, ZACHARY, twelfth President of the United States, born in Orange County, Virginia; obtained a Lieutenantcy in the navy in 1808; first saw service in Indian wars on the north-west frontier; in 1836 cleared the Indians from Florida and won the brevet of brigadier-general; great victories over the Mexicans on the Texan frontier during 1846-1848 raised his popularity to such a pitch that on his return he was carried triumphantly into the Presidency; the burning questions of his brief term of office were the proposed admission of California as a free State and the extension of slavery into the newly-acquired territory; was a man of strong character, a daring and skilful general, of unassuming manners, and loved by the masses of the people, to whom he was known as "Old Rough and Ready" (1784-1850).

TAYLOR INSTITUTE, a building in Oxford erected from bequests by Sir Robert Taylor and Dr. Randolph as a gallery to contain works of art left to the university, and constituting a noble collection.

TE ANAU, a lake in Otago, N. Island, New Zealand; it runs N. and S. for nearly 40 m. between snow-covered mountains, and is one of the most beautiful spots in the country.

TE DEUM (Thee, O God), a grand hymn in Latin, so called from the first words, sung at matins and on occasions of joy and thanksgiving; of uncertain authorship; is called also the Ambrosian Hymn, as ascribed, though without foundation, to St. Ambrose; is with more reason seemingly ascribed to Hilary, bishop of Arles.

TEA DUTY. The first tax on tea in England was imposed in 1660, and was retained at varying rates until 1929, when it was abolished by Winston Churchill. It was the levying of a tea duty in 1767 in America that led to the Boston Tea Party, when tea was thrown into Boston harbour, and to the "no taxation without representation" cry that ended in the American War of Independence and the formation of the United States.

TEBETH, in the Jewish civil year the fourth month and in the ecclesiastical the tenth; its name means the month of mud.

TECK, a German principality, named after a castle which crowns an eminence called "The Teck." In the Swabian Alps, 20 m. S.E. of Stuttgart, conferred in 1808 on Duke Albert of Württemberg's son, who in 1866 married the Princess Mary of Cambridge; their daughter, Princess May, becoming in 1910 Queen Mary of the British Empire.

TEDDINGTON, a town in Middlesex and virtually a suburb of London, on the Thames; its name is derived from "tide and town," as from this point the Thames ceases to be tidal. The town was once a manor belonging to Westminster Abbey and contains a 16th-century church; in 1902 the National Physical Laboratory was established here.

TEES, English river, rises on Cross Fell, Cumberland, and flows E., forming the boundary between Durham and York; enters the North Sea 4 m. below Stockton.

TEGNER, ESAIAS, a popular Swedish poet, born in Kyrkerud, the son of a country parson; graduated with distinction at Lund University in 1802, and shortly afterwards became lecturer in Philology; in 1812, already a noted poet, he was called to the chair of Greek, and in later years was the devoted bishop of Västerås. His poems, of which "Fritslöfs Saga" is reckoned the finest, have the clearness and finish of classic models, but are charged with the fire and vigour of modern romanticism (1782-1846).

TEGUCIGALPA, capital of Honduras, situated near the centre of the country at a height of 2400 ft., in the fertile valley of the Rio Grande, surrounded by mountains; has a cathedral and university.

TEHAMA, a low, narrow plain in Aralia, W. of the mountain range which overlooks the Red Sea.

TEHERAN, capital of Persia, stands on a plain near the Elburz Mountains, 70 m. N. of the Caspian Sea; is surrounded by a bastioned rampart and ditch, 10 m. in circumference, and entered by 12 gateways; much of it is of modern construction and handsomely laid out with parks, wide streets, and imposing buildings, notable among which are the shah's palace and the British Legation, besides many of the bazaars and wealthy merchant's houses; best during the summer drives the court, foreign embassies, and others to the cooler heights in the N.; staple industries are the manufactures of carpets, silks, and cottons.

TEHUANTEPEC, an isthmus in Mexico, 140 m. across, between a gulf of the same name and the Bay of Campeche; it contains on the Pacific coast a town of the same name, with manufactures and pearl fisheries.

TEIGNMOUTH, a watering-place and port of Devonshire, on the estuary of the Teign (here crossed by a wooden bridge 1671 ft. long), 12 m. S. of Exeter; has a Benedictine nunnery, baths, and pier; does some ship-building.

TEINDS, in Scotland tithes derived from the produce of the land for the maintenance of the clergy.

TEL. ABUR, a town in Palestine just off the Jerusalem-Nablus road, where Ammon was killed by order of Absalom. In March, 1918, Allenby gained a decisive victory here over the Turks.

TELAMONES, figures, generally colossal, of men supporting entablatures, as Caryatides of women.

TELEGRAPHS. The first telegraph company in Great Britain started operation in 1846; in 1871 the systems were taken over by the post office. The submarine cable between England and France was laid in 1851 and the first Atlantic cable six years later.

TEL-EL-KEBIR (the "Great Mound"), on the edge of the Egyptian desert, midway between Ismalia and Cairo, the scene of a memorable victory by the British forces under Sir Garnet Wolseley over the Egyptian forces of Arabi Pasha (September 13, 1882), which brought the war to a close.

TELEMACHUS, the son of Ulysses and Penelope (q.v.), who, an infant when his father left for Troy, was a grown-up man on his return; having gone in quest of his father after his long absence found him on his return in the guise of a beggar, and assisted him in slaying his mother's suitors.

TELEOLOGY, the doctrine of final causes, particularly the argument for the being and character of God from the being and character of His works, that the end reveals His purpose from the beginning, the end being regarded as the thought of God at the beginning, or the universe viewed as the realisation of Him and His eternal purpose.

TELEPATHY, name given to the supposed power of communication between mind and mind otherwise than by the ordinary sense vehicles.

TELEPHONE, invented by Graham Bell, an American, in 1876, following on the work of several other inventors; the system was established in Great Britain by the National Telephone Company, which was bought up by the Post Office in 1911.

TELESCOPE, the actual inventor is unknown, but Jansen, Galileo and Kepler all played a part in its production. It first came into general use in the first decade of the seventeenth century.

TELEVISION, the reproduction of a scene on a plate or film by means of wireless waves simultaneously with its occurrence.

TELFORD, THOMAS, a celebrated engineer, born, the son of a shepherd, in Wester Kirk parish, Eakdale; served an apprenticeship to a stone-mason, and after a sojourn in Edinburgh found employment in London in 1782; as surveyor of public works for Shropshire in 1787 constructed bridges over the Severn, and planned and superintended the Ellesmere Canal connecting the Dee, Mersey, and Severn; his reputation now made, he was in constant demand by Government, and was entrusted with the construction of the Caledonian Canal, the great road between London and Holyhead (including the Menai Suspension Bridge), and St. Katherine Docks, London, but his bridges, canals, harbours, and roads are to be found in all parts of the kingdom, and bear the stamp of his thorough and enduring workmanship. "the Colossus of Roads." Southey called him (1757-1834).

TELL, a fertile strip of land of 47 m. of average breadth in North-West Africa, between the mountains and the Mediterranean Sea; produces cereals, wine, &c.

TELL, WILLIAM, Swiss hero and patriot, a peasant, native of the canton of Uri, who flourished in the beginning of the 14th century; resisted the oppression of the Austrian governor Gessler, and was taken prisoner, but was promised his liberty if with his bow and arrow he could hit an apple on the head of his son, a feat he accomplished with one arrow, with a second arrow in his belt, which he told Gessler he had kept to shoot him with if he had failed. This so incensed the governor that he bound him to carry him off to his castle; but as they crossed the lake a storm arose, and Tell had to be unbound to save them, when he leapt upon a rock and made off, to lie in ambush, whence he shot the oppressor through the heart as he passed him; a rising followed, which ended only with the emancipation of Switzerland from the yoke of Austria.

TELLEZ, GABRIEL, the assumed name of Tirso de Molina, Spanish dramatist, born in Madrid; became a monk; wrote 58 comedies, some of which keep their place on the Spanish stage; as a dramatist ranks next to Lope de Vega, whose pupil he was (1583-1648).

TELLICHERRI, a seaport on the Malabar coast, Madras Presidency, India; is fortified and garrisoned; surrounding country is pretty, as well as productive of coffee, cardamoms, and sandalwood.

TELLURIUM, a rare metal usually found in combination with other metals.

TEMESVAR, a royal free city of Rumania, on the Hege (Danub), 75 m. N.E. of Belgrade; is a strongly-fortified, well-built city, equipped with theatre, schools, colleges, hospitals, &c., and possesses a handsome Gothic cathedral and ancient castle; manufactures flour, woollens, silks, and paper.

TEMPE, VALE OF, a valley in the N.E. of Thessaly, lying between Olympus on the N and Ossa on the S., traversed by the river Peneus, and for the beauty of its scenery celebrated by the Greek poets as a favourite haunt of Apollo and the Muses; it is rather less than 5 m. in length, and opens eastward into a spacious plain.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES were started early in the 19th century in reaction to the amount of drinking indulged in at the end of the previous century. One of the first was founded in the United States in 1825, and so successful has been temperance propaganda in that country that by a law known as the "eighteenth amendment," the sale and consumption of intoxicants is prohibited. Evasion of the law however is common. In England the British and Foreign Temperance Society was founded in 1831, and the London Temperance League in 1851; other active temperance bodies include the Church of England Temperance Society and the British Women's Temperance Society. While not successful in securing legal reforms they have long succeeded, for these bodies can to some extent claim to have reduced drunkenness in England, and it is partly owing to their work that the consumption of intoxicants has fallen.

TEMPLARS, a famous order of knights which flourished during the Middle Ages, and originated in connection with the Crusades. Its founders were Hugues de Payen and Geoffroi de St. Omer, who, along with 17 other French knights, in 1119 formed themselves into a brotherhood, taking vows of chastity and poverty, for the purpose of conveying, in safety from attacks of Saracens and Infidels, pilgrims to the Holy Land. King Baldwin II. of Jerusalem granted them a residence in a portion of his palace, built on the site of the Temple of Solomon, and chose to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which became the sacred object of their protection. Hence their assumption of the name "Templars." The order rapidly increased in numbers and drew members from all classes. "The Templar was the embodiment of the two strongest passions of the Middle Ages—the desire for military renown and for a monk's life." A constitution was drawn up by Bernard of Clairvaux (1129), and later three ranks were recognised—the knights, who alone wore the mantle of white linen and red cross, men-at-arms, and lower retainers, while a grand-master, seneschal, and other officers were created. During the first 150 years of their existence the Templars increased enormously in power; under papal authority they enjoyed many privileges, such as exemption from taxes, tithes, and interdict. After the capture of Jerusalem by the Infidels Cyprus became in 1291 their headquarters, and subsequently France. But their usefulness was at an end, and their arrogance, luxury, and quarrels with the Hospitallers had alienated the sympathies of Christendom. Measures of the cruellest and most barbarous kind were taken for their suppression by Philip the Fair of France, supported by Pope Clement IV. Between 1306 and 1314 hundreds were burned at the stake, the order scattered, and their possessions confiscated.

TEMPLE BAR, a famous London gateway, which formerly divided Fleet Street from the Strand; pressure of traffic caused its removal in 1879; now stands in Theobald's Park, Cheshunt.

TEMPLE CHURCH, one of the oldest churches in London, just off the Strand, belonging to the Inner and Middle Temple. Built by the Knights Templar, it was consecrated in 1185, and is modelled on the Holy Sepulchre, like the only other round churches in England, those at Cambridge, Northampton, and Little Maplestead, Essex. Restoration work was carried out in the 19th century.

TEMPLE, FREDERICK, archbishop of Canterbury, born in Santa Maure, in Leukese, one of the Ionian Islands; was highly distinguished at Balliol College, Oxford, as graduate, fellow, and tutor; in 1846 became Principal of Kneller Hall Training College, was one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, and from 1858 to 1869 was head-master of Rugby; a Liberal in politics, he supported the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and as a Broad-Churchman was elected to the bishopric of Exeter (1869), of London (1885), and in 1896 was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury; contributed to the celebrated "Essays and Reviews"; published "Sermons Preached in Rugby Chapel," and in 1884 was Bampton Lecturer (1882-1892).

TEMPLE, MOST REV. WILLIAM, British divine. A son of the Archbishop of Canterbury preceding, he was president of the Oxford Union in 1904, and was ordained in 1908; for four years from 1910 he was headmaster of Repton, and in 1919 became canon of Westminster, a post he held for two years before being made Bishop of Manchester; in 1928 he became Archbishop of York (1881-).

TEMPLE, SIR WILLIAM, diplomatist and essayist, born in London, and educated at Cambridge; travel on the Continent, courtship, and marriage, and some years of quiet and studious retirement in Ireland occupied him during the Protectorate; in 1660 was returned to the Convention Parliament at Dublin, and five years later, having resettled in England, began his diplomatic career, the most notable success in which was his arrangement in 1668 of the Triple Alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden to help in check the growing power of France; as ambassador at The Hague became friendly with the Prince of Orange, whose marriage with the Princess Mary (daughter of James II.) he negotiated; was recalled in 1671, but after the Dutch War returned to his labours at The Hague, and in 1679 carried through the Peace of Nimeguen; although offered a State Secretaryship more than once, shrank from the responsibilities of office under Charles II., a diffidence he again showed in the reign of William III.; the later years of his life were spent in Epicurean ease, in the enjoyment of his garden, and in the pursuit of letters at his villa at Sheen, and, after 1686, at Moor Park, in Surrey, where he had Swift for secretary; is remembered in constitutional history for his scheme (a failure ultimately) to put the king more completely under the check of the Privy Council by remodelling its constitution; was a writer of considerable distinction, his miscellaneous essays and memoirs being notable for grace and perspicuity of style (1628-1699).

TEMPLE, THE, of Jerusalem, a building constructed on the same plan and for the same purpose as the Tabernacle (q.v.), only of larger dimensions, more substantial and costly materials, and a more ornate style; it was a magnificent structure, contained treasures of wealth, and was the pride of the Hebrew people. There were three successive structures that bore the name—Solomon's, built by Solomon in 1004 B.C., and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar in 588 B.C.; Zerubbabel's, built in 515, and pillaged and desecrated by Antiochus Epiphanes in 167 B.C.; and Herod's, on the ruins of the former, begun in 16 A.D., finished in 29 A.D., and destroyed by Titus in 70 A.D. All three were built on Mount Moriah, on the spot where Abraham offered up Isaac, and where David afterwards raised an altar to the Lord; and of the number the palm must be given to the Temple of Solomon. It was the Temple par excellence.

TEN, COUNCIL OF, In Venice during the 14th century a body of ten councillors or magistrates annually elected to serve with the doge and his councillors for the transaction of matters of urgency; its power was extended to affairs of State and in time the secrecy and severity of its procedure made it widely feared.

TENASSERIM, the southernmost division of Burma, forms a long coastal strip facing the Bay of Bengal and backed by the mountain barrier of Siam; acquired by the British in 1825.

TENBY, a popular little watering-place of Pembrokeshire, has a rocky site on Carmarthen Bay coast; ruins of its old wall and of a castle still remain; has a fine 13th-century Gothic church, and a marble statue of the Prince Consort, while its extensive sands and splendid bathing facilities attract crowds of summer visitors.

TENDON, MADAME DE, a French writer of romances, a woman of clever wit and of personal charms, who abandoned a religious life and, coming to Paris in 1714, immersed herself in the political and fashionable life of the city; was not too careful of her morals, and ranked among her lovers the Regent, Fontenelle, and Cardinal Dubois; used her influence against the Jansenists; more circumstanced in later life she presided over a fashionable salon; was the mother of D'Alembert (1681-1749).

TENDON, ACHILLES, name given to the tendon of the leg above the heel, so called as being the tendon by which Thetis held Achilles when she dipped him in the Styx, and where alone he was in consequence vulnerable.

TENEDOS, a rocky but fertile little island belonging, since 1920, to Greece, prior to which it was Turkish; it lies in the Aegean, 3 in. off the mainland of Turkey in Asia, and 12 m. N. of the entrance to the Dardanelles; it was the place where the Greek fleet was stationed during the Trojan War.

TENERIFE, the largest of the Canary Islands (q.v.), of volcanic formation, with cliff-bound coast; richly fruit-bearing; chief exports, cochineal, tobacco, and wine; capital, Santa Cruz (q.v.); most notable natural feature is the famous Peak of Tenerife, a conical-shaped dormant volcano, 12,000 ft. in height, at the summit of which there is a crater 300 ft. in circuit; last eruption took place in 1798.

TENIERS, DAVID, the elder (1622-1649), and David Teniers, the younger (1610-1690), father and son, both famous masters of the Flemish school of painting, and natives of Antwerp; the greater genius belonged to the younger, who carried his father's gift of depicting rural and homely life to a higher pitch of perfection.

TENNANT, WILLIAM, a minor Scottish poet, born in Anstruther, Fife, was educated at St. Andrews, and after a short experience of business life betook himself to teaching in 1818, filling posts at Dunino, Lasswade, and Dollar; his most notable poem, "Anster Fair" (1812), was warmly received, and in 1835 his knowledge of Eastern languages won him the chair of Oriental languages in St. Andrews (1784-1848).

TENNEBACH, WILHELM GOTTLIEB, German historian of philosophy; was professor at Marburg; wrote both a history and a manual of philosophy, and translated Locke's and Hume's works into German (1781-1819).

TENNESSEE, one of the central States of the U.S.A., lies S. of Kentucky, and stretches from the Mississippi (W.) to North Carolina (E.); is one-third larger than Ireland; politically it is divided into three districts with characteristic natural features; East Tennessee, mountainous, with ridges of the Appalachians, possessing inexhaustible stores of coal, iron, and copper; Middle Tennessee an undulating, wheat, corn, and tobacco-growing country; and West Tennessee, with lower-lying plains growing cotton, and traversed by the Tennessee River, the largest affluent of the Ohio; Nashville is the capital and largest city; became a State in 1796.

TENNIEL, SIR JOHN, a famous cartoonist who, from 1864, week by week, drew the chief political cartoon in Punch, the merits of which are too well known to need comment; illustrations to "Æsop's Fables," "Ingoldsby Legends," "Alice in Wonderland," and other works, reveal the grace and delicacy of his workmanship; born in London, and practically a self-taught artist, joined the staff of Punch in 1851; was knighted in 1893 (1820-1914).

TENNIS originated in France and Italy in the Middle Ages, being derived from handball; racquets did not come into use till the 14th century. The game had reached England by the time Chaucer wrote, and continued afterwards as a game for the nobility, Henry VIII. being a player. This "real" tennis continues to be played by a few, but the expense of maintaining courts led to the growth of Lawes Tennis, a popular variant of the original game started by Major Wingfield in 1874. In 1875 the M.C.C. issued a code of laws for the new game, a court was opened at Wimbledon, and in 1877 the first championship was held there. The Lawn Tennis Association was formed in 1888, and in 1900 the Davis Cup competition was instituted for international male matches, and soon attracted entries from Britain, America, Canada, Australia, South Africa, India, Japan, and nearly every Continental country. Besides these matches the principal tennis fixtures are the annual championships at Wimbledon, St. Cloud, and Forest Hills (U.S.A.), and the Anglo-American women's contests for the Wightman Cup. Of recent years there has been a tendency to play lawn tennis more on hard courts than on grass. Among the players who have helped the phenomenal growth of the game have been William and Ernest Renshaw, H. L. and H. E. Doherty, A. W. Gore, N. L. Brookes, W. Tilden, G. Patterson, R. Lacoste, Mlle. S. Lenglen and Helen Wills.

TENNYSON, ALFRED, LORD, poet-laureate, born in Somersby, in Lincolnshire, son of a clergyman, and of aristocratic descent; was educated at the grammar school of Louth and at Trinity College, Cambridge, which latter he left without taking a degree, having already devoted himself to the "Ars Poetica," an art which he cultivated more and more all his life long; entered the university in 1828, and issued his first volume of poems in 1830, though he had four years previously contributed to a small volume conjointly with his brother, to the poems of 1830 he added others, and published them in 1833 and 1842, after which, endowed by a pension from the Civil List of £200, he produced "The Princess" in 1847, and "In Memoriam" (in memory of his friend Arthur Hallam) in 1850; was in 1851 appointed to the laureateship, and next in that capacity wrote his "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington"; in 1855 appeared his "Maud," in 1859 the first four of his "Idylls of the King," which were followed by "Enoch Arden" and the "Northern Farmer" in 1864, and by a succession of other pieces; in 1875 he turned to dramatic art and produced thereafter "Queen Mary," "Harold," "The Cup," "Becket," and "The Foresters"; he was raised by the peerage in 1884 on the recommendation of Mr. Gladstone; he was a poet of the ideal, and was distinguished for the exquisite purity of his style and the harmony of his rhythm; had a loving veneration for the past, and an adoring regard for everything pure and noble, and if he indulged in a vein of sadness at all, as he sometimes did, it was when he saw, as he could not help seeing, the feeblest hold that regard for such things had on the men and women of his generation than the worship of Mammon (1809-1892).

TENNYSON-TURNER, CHARLES, British poet and brother of Lord Tennyson, who took the second name of Turner on coming into an inheritance. In 1826 he and his brother published jointly "Poems by Two Brothers"; he wrote a number of quite good sonnets (1808-1879).

TENSOR, highest part sung by the natural male voice, covering about two octaves in compass.

TENTERDEN, a market town in Kent, once a Cinque Port; the steeples of its church is reported to have been the cause of the Goodwin Sands, the stones intended for the dyke which kept the sea off having been used instead to repair the church.

TENTERDEN, LORD, English judge, born in Canterbury; wrote a "Treatise on the Law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen"; was raised to the peerage, an obstinate enemy of Reform (1762-1832).

TERATOLOGY, the branch of biology which treats of malformations or departures from the normal type.

TERBURG, GERHARD, a noted Dutch painter, whose portraits and genre pictures are to be found in most of the great European galleries; born in Zwolle; after travelling in Germany, Italy, England, and Spain, settled at Deventer, where he became burgo-master; his most famous pictures are a portrait of William of Orange, "Father's Advice," and his "Congress of Munster, 1648," which last was bought for £7280 and presented to the National Gallery, London (circa 1617-1681).

TERCEIRA, the second largest of the Azores; rears cattle, and yields grain, oranges, and other fruits; chief town Angra, capital of the group.

TERENCE (Publius Terentius Afer), Roman comic poet, born in Carthage; brought thence as a slave; educated by his master, a Roman senator, and set free; composed plays, adaptations of others in Greek by Menander and Apollodorus; they depict Greek manners for Roman imitation in a pure and perfect Latin style, and with great dramatic skill (circa 190-159 B.C.).

TERESA. See PHILOMELA.

TERMINUS, in Roman mythology a deity who presided over boundaries, the worship of whom was instituted by Numa (c. r.).

TERPSICHOE, the Muse of choral song and dancing.

TERRA-COTTA, a composition of fine clay and fine colourless sand moulded into shapes and baked to hardness.

TERRAY, ABBE, "disolute financier" of Louis XV., "paying eightpence in the shilling, so that wit's exclaim in some prose at the play-house, 'Where is Abbe Terray that he might reduce it to two-thirds!'" lived a scandalous life, and ingratiated himself with Madame Pompadour; he held his post till the accession of Louis XVI., and fell with his iniquitous colleagues (1715-1778).

TERRE-HAUTE, capital of Vigo County, Indiana, stands on a plateau overlooking the Wabash, 178 m. S. of Chicago; is situated in a rich coal district, and has numerous foundries and various factories; is well equipped with schools and other public institutions.

TERRITORIALS, the amateur section of the British army formed in 1908 to supersede the old Volunteers. Members have to attend annual camp, put in a minimum number of parades, and undergo courses of instruction. Although foreign service was optional the Territorial regiments formed a very important section of the army in France in the Great War, especially between 1914 and the raising of the new armies.

TERRY, ELLEN (Mrs. James Carew), celebrated English actress, born in Coventry; made her debut at the early age of eight, appearing as Mamilus in "The Winter's Tale," at the Princess Theatre, then under the management of Charles Kean; married in 1864 G. F. Watts, the painter, the marriage being dissolved soon after; during the years 1864-1874 she lived in retirement, but returning to the stage in 1875 achieved her first great success in the character of Fortia; played for some time with the Bancrofts and at the Court Theatre; in December, 1878, made her first appearance at the Lyceum Theatre, then under the management of Henry Irving (c. r.), with whose subsequent successful career her own is inseparably associated, sharing with him the honours of a long list of memorable Shakespearian and other performances (1848-1928).

TERSANCTUS, the acclamation of praise, Holy, Holy, Holy, preliminary to the consecrating prayer in Holy Communion.

TERTULLIAN, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENTI, one of the Latin Fathers, born in Carthage, the son of a Roman centurion; was well educated; bred a rhetorician; was converted to Christianity, became presbyter of Carthage, and embraced Montanist views (q.v.); wrote numerous works, apologetical, polemical, doctrinal, and practical, the last of an ascetic tendency (180-230).

TESLA, NIKOLA, Serbian scientist, famous for his inventions in connection with electrical oscillations and their practical applications (1857-).

TEST ACT, act of date 1673, now repealed, requiring all officials under the crown to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy; directed equally against Dissenters and Roman Catholics.

TEST MATCHES, the name given to international cricket matches, the most important of which are those played between England and Australia, which were inaugurated in 1880; England first met South Africa in Test Matches in 1905; in 1912 a triangular contest between these three was held; the West Indies first met England in Test Matches in 1928, and New Zealand followed in 1929.

TESTER, a silver coin used in the 16th century in Scotland and France, and to some extent in England. Originally the English coin was worth a shilling, though it later depreciated in value to sixpence.

TESTUDO (tortoise-shell), in ancient Roman warfare a covering of the shields of the soldiers held over their heads as protection against missiles thrown from the walls when besieging a city.

TETANUS, or LOCK-JAW, a nervous affection of a most painful and fatal character, which usually begins with intensely painful and persistent cramp of the muscles of the throat and jaws, spreading down to the larger muscles of the body. As the disease progresses the muscles become more and more rigid, while the paroxysms of pain increase in violence and frequency. Death as a rule results from either sheer exhaustion or failure of breath through the spasmodic closure of the glottis. The cause of the disease is now ascertained to be due to the action of a microbe, which may find an entrance through any wound or abrasion of the skin, not necessarily of the thumb as is the popular belief.

TETHYS, in the Greek mythology a daughter of Uranus and Gaia, wife of Oceanus (q.v.), and mother of the river-gods.

TETRADRACHM, a silver coin in use in ancient Greece of the value of four drachmas, or about three shillings.

TETRAGRAMMATON, the mystic number "four," symbolical of deity, whose name in different languages is composed of four letters.

TETRAZZINI, MADAME, Italian soprano singer. Born in Florence, she made an early reputation on the Continent, toured South America, and made her London debut in 1908; spending most of her time in Italy she drew large audiences whenever she sang in public in any country.

TETUAN, a port and walled town of Morocco, on the Maril, 4 m. above its entrance into the Mediterranean and 22 m. S. of Ceuta; has a fortified castle and wall-towers; exports provisions to Ceuta, and has a good trade in fruit, wool, silk, cotton, &c.

TETZEL, JOHN, a Dominican friar, born in Leipzig; was employed in the sale of indulgences to all who subscribed to the fund for building St. Peter's at Rome, in opposition to whom and his doings Luther published his celebrated theses in 1517; his extravagances involved him in the censure of the Church (1455-1519).

TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, like the Templars (q.v.) and Hospitaliers, a religious order of knighthood which arose during the period of the Crusades, originally for the purpose of tending wounded crusaders; subsequently became military in character, and besides the care of the sick and wounded included among its objects aggressive warfare upon the heathen; was organized much in the same way as the Templars, and like them acquired extensive territorial possessions; during the 14th and 15th centuries were constantly at war with the heathen Wends and Lithuanians, but the conversion of these to Christianity and several defeats destroyed both the prestige and usefulness of the knights, and the order thenceforth began to decline. As a secularised, land-owning order the knighthood lasted till 1809, when it was entirely suppressed in Germany by Napoleon; but branches still exist in the Netherlands and in Austria, where care for the wounded in war has been resumed.

TEUTONS, the most energetic and progressive section of the Aryan group of nations, embracing the following races speaking languages traceable to a common stock: (1) Germanic, including Germans, Dutch, Flemings, and English; (2) Scandinavian, embracing Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Icelanders. But naturally Celts and other race-elements have in the course of centuries entered into the composition of these peoples.

TEWFIK PASHA, MOHAMMED, khedive of Egypt from the time of his father's abdication in 1879; a man of simple tastes and religious disposition, friendly and loyal to the English; Arabi Pasha's insurrection, closed at Tel-el-Kheir (q.v.), and the Mahdi's rising and capture of Khartoum, occurred during his reign, which, however, also witnessed Egypt's steadily increasing prosperity under English rule (1852-1902).

TWICKESBURY, a market town of Gloucestershire, at the confluence of the Avon and Severn (here spanned by one of Telford's bridges), 10 m. N.E. of Gloucester; possesses one of the finest of old English churches in the Norman style; trades chiefly in agricultural produce, half a mile distant is the field of the battle of Twickesbury (May 4, 1471), where the Yorkists under Edward IV. crushed the Lancastrians.

TEXAS, the largest of the United States of America, in the extreme SW., fronts the Gulf of Mexico for 400 m. between Mexico (W.) and Louisiana (E.); has an area more than twice that of the British Isles, exhibiting a great variety of soil from rich alluvial valleys and pastoral prairies to arid deserts of sand in the S. Climate in the S. is semi-tropical, in the N. colder and drier. The useful metals are found in abundance, but agriculture and stock-raising are the chief occupations, Texas being the leading cattle-raising and cotton State in the Union; seceded from the republic of Mexico in 1836, and was an independent State till 1846, when it was annexed to the American Union. Austin is the capital and Galveston the principal port.

TEXEL, an island of North Holland, situated at the entrance to the Zuider Zee and separated from the mainland by a narrow strait called the Maraldi, the scene of several memorable naval engagements between the Dutch and English; staple industries are sheep and dairy farming.

TEZCUO, a city of Mexico which, under the name Acolhuacan, was once a centre of Aztec culture, of which there are interesting remains still extant; is situated on a sun lake bearing the same name, 25 m. N.E. of Mexico City.

THACKERAY, WILLIAM MAKEPEACE, novelist, born in Calcutta, educated at the Charterhouse and at Trinity College, Cambridge; after leaving college, which he did without taking a degree, travelled on the Continent, making long stays at Rome and Paris, and "the dear little Mason town (Weimar) where Goethe lived"; his ambition was to be an artist, but failing in that and pecuniary resources, he turned to literature; in straitened circumstances at first wrote for the journals of the day and contributed to Punch, in which the well-known "Snob Papers" and "Joanna's Diary" originally appeared; in 1840 he produced the "Paris Sketch-Book," his first published work, but it was not till 1847 the first of his novels, "Vanity Fair," was issued in parts, which was followed in 1848 by "Pendennis." In 1862 by "Emmeline," in 1863 by "The Newcomes," in 1867 by "The Virginians," in 1862 by "Philip," and in 1863 by "Denis Duval." In 1852 he lectured in the United States on "The English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century," and in 1855 on "The Four Georges," while in 1850 he was appointed first editor of Cornhill. Of Thackeray, in comparison with Dickens, M. Taine says, he was "more self-contained, better instructed and stronger, a lover of moral dissertations, a counsellor of the public, a sort of lay preacher, less bent on defending the poor, more bent on censuring man; brought to the aid of satire a sustained common-sense, great knowledge of the heart, consummate cleverness, powerful reasoning, a store of meditated hatred, and persecuted vice with all the weapons of reflection. . . . His novels are a war against the upper classes of his country" (1811-1863).

THAIS, an Athenian courtesan who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia; after his death bore children to Ptolemy Lagi.

THALBERG, SIGISMUND, a celebrated pianist, born in Geneva; early displayed a talent for music and languages; was intended and trained for a diplomatic career, but, overcoming his father's scruples, followed his bent for music, and soon took rank as one of the most brilliant pianists of the age; "Thalberg," said Liszt, "is the only pianist who can play the violin on the key-board"; composed a large number of pianoforte pieces, chiefly fantasias and variations (1812-1871).

THALES, philosopher of Greece, and one of her seven sages; was a philosopher of the physical school, and the father of philosophy in general, as the first to seek and find within Nature an explanation of Nature; "the principle of all things is water," he says; "all comes from water, and to water all returns"; flourished about the close of the 7th century B.C.

THALIA, one of the three Graces (g.e.), as also of the nine Muses (g.e.).

THALLIUM, a rare metallic element similar to lead, but heavier, discovered in 1861 by the green in the spectrum in the flame as it was being volatilized.

THAMES, the most important river of Great Britain, formed by the junction at Lechlade of four head-streams—the Isis, Churn, Coln, and Leach—which spring from the S.E. slope of the Cotswold Hills; winds across the southern midlands eastwards till in a wide estuary it enters the North Sea; forms the boundary-line between several counties, and passes Oxford, Windsor, Eton, Richmond, London, Woolwich, and Gravesend; navigable for barges to Lechlade, and for ocean steamers to Tilbury Docks; tide is felt as far as Teddington, 80 m.; length estimated at 250 m.

THANE, or THEGN, a title of social distinction among the Anglo-Saxons, bestowed, in the first instance, upon men bound in military service to the king, these coming to form a nobility of service as distinguished from a nobility of blood; they obtained grants of land, and had thegn under them; in this way the class of thegns widened; subsequently the name was allowed to the coori who had acquired four hides of land and fulfilled certain requirements; after the Norman conquest the thegnhood practically embraced the knight-hood; the name dropped out of use after Henry II.'s reign, but lasted longer in Scotland.

THANET, ISLE OF, forms the N.E. corner of Kent, from the mainland of which it is separated by the Stour and the rivulet Nethersong; on its shores, washed by the North Sea, stand the popular watering-places Ramsgate, Margate, and Broadstairs; the north-eastern extremity, the North Foreland, is crowned by a lighthouse, and is an important radio station.

THASOS, an island of Turkey, in the Aegean Sea, near the Macedonian coast; is mountainous and richly wooded; inhabited almost entirely by Greeks.

THAUMUZ. See TAUMUZ.

THEATINES, a religious order founded primarily for the suppression of heresy; the order was founded in Italy in the 16th century, and its members took a vow of poverty; the order is now almost extinct.

THÉÂTRE FRANÇAIS, theatre in the Palais Royal, Paris, where the French classic plays are produced and rendered by first-class artists.

THEATRES, in England, were first authorized in the 16th century; the first was built by Burbage in Shoreditch in 1574, and soon after it the Globe in Southwark, where many of Shakespeare's plays had their first production, was opened.

THEBAIDE, a desert in Upper Egypt; the retreat in early times of a number of Christian hermits.

THEBANS, name given to the inhabitants of Boetia, from Thebes, the capital; were reckoned dull and stupid by the Athenians.

THEBES, an ancient city of Egypt of great renown, once capital of Upper Egypt; covered 10 sq. m. of the valley of the Nile on both sides of the river, 300 m. S.E. of Cairo; now represented by imposing ruins of temples, palaces, tombs, and statues of colossal size, amid which the humble dwellings of four villages—Luxor, Karnak, Medinet Habu, and Kurna—have been raised. The period of its greatest grandeur extended from about 1800 to 1100 B.C., but some of its ruins have been dated as far back as 2500 B.C.

THEBES, capital of the ancient Grecian State Boetia (g.e.), whose site on the slopes of Mount Teumessus, 44 m. N.W. of Athens, is now occupied by the village of Thiva; its legendary history, embracing the names of Cadmus, Dionysus, Hercules, Œdipus, &c., and authentic struggles with Athens and Sparta during the Peloponnesian War, its rise to supremacy under Epaminondas over all Greece, and its destruction by Alexander, have all combined to place it amongst the most famous cities of ancient Greece.

THEISM, belief in the existence of God associated in general with a belief in Providence and Revelation.

THEISS, the longest river of Hungary and largest of the affluents of the Danube; is formed in East Hungary by the confluence of the White Theiss and the Black Theiss, both springing from south-western slopes of the Carpathians; after a great sweep to the N.W. bends round to the S., and flows steadily southward through the centre of Hungary until it joins the Danube 20 m. above Belgrade, after a course of 780 m., with its greater tributaries, the Maros and the Bodrog, it forms a splendid means of internal commerce.

THELLUSON ACT, a measure passed in 1800 to prevent a testator leaving money to accumulate for more than 21 years after his death, and occasioned by Peter Thellusson in 1797 leaving half a million pounds to accumulate at compound interest for two generations. The Act was modified in 1927 to allow money to be left to the State to accumulate and be applied to the redemption of the National Debt.

THEMIS, in the Greek mythology the goddess of the established order of things; was a daughter of Uranus and Gaia, and the spouse of Zeus, through whom she became the mother of the divinities concerned in maintaining order among, at once, gods and men.

THEMISTOCLES, celebrated Athenian general and statesman; rose to political power on the ostracism of Aristides, his rival; persuaded the citizens to form a fleet to secure the command of the sea against Persian invasion; commanded at Salamis, and routed the fleet of Xerxes, and afterwards accomplished the fortification of the city in spite of the opposition of Sparta, but falling in popular favour was ostracised, and took refuge at the court of Artaxerxes of Persia, where he died in high favour with the king (c. 580-460 B.C.).

THEOBALD, LEWIS, Shakespearean critic, born in Sittingbourne, Kent; bred to the law by his father, an attorney, but took to literature; wrote a tragedy, contributed to Mist's Journal, and in 1716 began his tri-weekly paper, the Censor; roused Pope's ire by his celebrated pamphlet, "Shakespeare Restored," an exposure of errors in Pope's edition, and although ruthlessly impaled in the "Dunciad," of which he was the original hero, made good his claim to genuine Shakespearean scholarship by his edition, in 1753, of the dramatist's works, an edition which completely superseded Pope's (1698-1744).

THEOCRACY, government of a State professedly in the name and under the direction as well as the sanction of Heaven.

THEOCRTUS, great pastoral poet of Greece, born in Syracuse; was the creator of bucolic poetry; wrote "Idylls" as they were called. Descriptive of the common life of the common people of Sicily, in a thoroughly objective, though a truly poetical, spirit, in a style which never fails to charm, being as fresh as ever; wrote also on epic subjects (c. 310-265 B.C.).

THEODICY, name given to an attempt to vindicate the order of the universe in consistency with the presence of evil, and especially to that of Leibnitz, in which he demonstrates that this is the best of all possible worlds.

THEODORA, the famous consort of the Roman Emperor Justinian I. (c. 527), who, captivated by her extraordinary charms of wit and person, raised her from a life of shame to share his throne (527), a high office she did not discredit; scandal, busy enough with her early years, has no word to say against her subsequent career as empress; the poor and unfortunate of her own sex were her special care; remained to the last the faithful helpmate of her husband (508-548).

THEODORE, "King of Corsica," otherwise Baron Theodore de Neuhoff, born in Metz; a soldier of fortune under the French, Swedish, and Spanish flags successively, whose title to fame is his expedition to Corsica, aided by the Turks and the Bey of Tunis, in 1786, to aid the islanders to throw off the Genoese yoke; was crowned King Theodore I., but in a few months was driven out, and after unsuccessful efforts to regain his position came as an impoverished adventurer to London, where creditors imprisoned him, and where sympathisers, including Walpole, subscribed for his release (1686-1766).

THEODORE, bishop of Mopsuestia, in Cilicia, born in Antioch; was a Biblical exegete, having written commentaries on most of the books of the Bible, eschewing the allegorical method of interpretation, and accepting the literal sense; he held Nestorian views, and his writings were anathematized; he was a friend of St. Chrysostom; d. about 428.

THEODORE, king of Abyssinia. He was a cruel and despotical ruler; in the sixties he imprisoned a British consul named Cameron, an action that was followed by General Napier's expedition to Magdala, which fell in 1868; Theodore committed suicide when thus defeated (1818-1868).

THEODORET, Church historian, born in Antioch; as bishop of the Syrian city, Cyrrus, gave himself to the conversion of the Marcionites; a leader of the Antioch school of theology, he took an active part in the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, and was deposed by the so-called robber-council of Ephesus, but was reinstated by the Council of Chalcedon in 451 (c. 390-457).

THEODORIC, surnamed the Great, founder of the monarchy of the Ostro- or East Goths, son of Theodimir, the Ostrogothic king of Pannonia; was for ten years during his youth a hostage at the Byzantine Court at Constantinople; succeeded his father in 475, and immediately began to push the fortunes of the Ostrogoths; various territories fell into his hands, and alarm arose at the Imperial Court, in 493 advanced upon Italy, overthrew Odoacer, and after his murder became sole ruler; was now the most powerful of the Gothic kings, with an empire embracing Italy, Sicily, and Dalmatia, besides German possessions; as a ruler proved himself as wise as he was strong; became in after years one of the great heroes of German legend, and figures in the "Nibelungenlied" (455-526).

THEODOSIUS I. THE GREAT, Roman emperor; was the son of Theodosius the Elder, a noted general, in whose campaigns in Britain and elsewhere he participated; marked out for distinction by his military prowess, he, in 379, was invited by the Emperor Gratian to become emperor in the East, that he might stem the advancing Goths; in this Theodosius was successful; the Goths were defeated, conciliated, had territory conceded to them, and became in large numbers Roman citizens; rebellions in the Western Empire and usurpations of the throne compelled Theodosius to active interference, which led to his becoming sole head of the empire (394), after successfully combating the revolutionaries, Franks, and others; was a zealous Churchman, and stern suppressor of the "Arian Heresy"; the close of his reign marks the beginning of the end of the Roman Empire, for his death opened the floodgates of barbarian invasion, and from this date begins the formation of the new kingdoms of Europe (346-395).

THEOGNIS, an elegiac poet of Megara; flourished in the second half of the 6th century B.C.; lost his possessions during a revolution at Megara, in which the democrats overpowered the aristocrats, to which party he belonged; compelled to live in exile, he found solace in the writing of poetry full of a practical and prudential wisdom, bitterly biased against democracy, and tinged with pessimism.

THEOLOGY, the science which treats of God, particularly as He manifests Himself in His relation to man in nature, reason, or revelation.

THEOPHRASTUS, a peripatetic philosopher, born in Lesbos; pupil, heir, and successor of Aristotle, and the great interpreter and expounder of his philosophy; was widely famous in his day; his writings were numerous, but only a few are extant, on plants, stars, and fire; d. 286 B.C.

THEOSOPHY (i.e. divine wisdom), a mystic philosophy of very difficult definition which hails from the East, and was introduced among us by Madame Blavatsky, a Russian lady, who was initiated into its mysteries in Tibet by a fraternity there who professed to be the sole custodians of its secrets as the spiritual successors of those to whom it was at first revealed. The radical idea of the system appears to be reincarnation, and the return of the spirit to itself by a succession of incarnations, each one of which raises it to a higher level, until, by seven stages it would seem, the process is complete, matter has become spirit, and spirit matter, God has become man, and man God, agreeably somewhat to the doctrine of Amiel, that "the complete spiritualization of the animal element in us is the task of our race," though with them it seems rather to mean its extinction. The adherents of this system, with their headquarters at Madras, are numerous and wide-scattered, and form an organization of 300 branches, having three definite aims: (1) To establish a brotherhood over the world irrespective of race, creed, caste, or sex; (2) to encourage the study of comparative philosophy, religion, and science; and (3) to investigate the occult secrets of nature and the latent possibilities of man. The principal books in exposition of it are, "The Secret Doctrine," "Isis Unveiled," "The Key to Theosophy," by Mme. Blavatsky; "Esoteric Buddhism," "The Occult World," &c., by Rinnett; "The Ancient Wisdom," "The Birth and Evolution of the Soul," &c., by Annie Besant.

THERAPEUTIC, a Jewish ascetic sect in Egypt, who lived a life of celibacy and meditation in separate hermitages, and assembled for worship on the Sabbath.

THERM, a unit of heat measurement equivalent to 100,000 British Thermal Units; the latter being the quantity of heat required to raise 1 lb. of pure water 1° F.

THERMIT PROCESS, for welding metals together, was discovered by Goldschmidt, a German chemist; the broken part is heated and a mixture of molten aluminium and metallic oxides is added; the oxides are reduced by the aluminium, enough heat being evolved to raise the pieces of broken metal to the melting-point.

THERMO-DYNAMICS, name given to the modern science of the relation between heat and work, which has established two fundamental principles, that when heat is employed to do work, the work done is the exact equivalent of the heat expended, and that heat cannot of its own accord pass from a colder to a warmer body.

THERMOMETERS, instruments used for measuring temperatures. Liquid thermometers are filled with either mercury or alcohol, the former for high temperatures up to 357° C. and the latter for temperatures below - 40° C.; electrical thermometers are used for very high temperatures; the Centigrade scale used in most European countries and for scientific work has freezing-point 0° and boiling-point 100°; on the Fahrenheit scale, generally used in this country, the freezing-point is 32° and the boiling-point 212°; in Germany the Reaumur scale is used, with freezing-point 0° and boiling-point 80°; for some scientific purposes an air thermometer is used.

THERMOPYLE, a delicate electrical instrument for detecting and measuring small quantities of radiant heat.

THERMOPYLE, (i.e. "the hot gates"), a famous pass in N. Greece, the only traversable one leading southward into Thessaly, lies 25 m. N. of Delphi, and is flanked on one side by Mount Ceta, and on the other by the Malac Gulf (now the Gulf of Zeltoumi); for ever memorable as the scene of Leonidas's heroic attempt with his 300 Spartans to stem the advancing Persian hordes under Xerxes (480 B.C.); also of Greece's futile struggles against Brennus and the Gauls (279 B.C.), and Philip the Macedonian (207 B.C.).

THESSITES, a deformed Greek present at the siege of Troy, distinguished for his insolent gallantry at his betters, and slain by Achilles for deriding his lamentation over the death of Penthesilea (q.v.).

THESEUS, legendary hero of Attica, and son of Ægeus, king of Athens; ranks second to Hercules, captured the Marathonian bull, and slew the Minotaur (q.v.) by the help of Ariadne (q.v.); waged war against the Amazons, and carried off the queen; assisted at the Argonautic expedition, and is famed for his friendship for Perithous, whom he aided against the Centaurs.

THESPIA, the father of Greek tragedy, hence Thespian play for the drama.

THESSALONIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, epistles of St. Paul to the Church at Thessalonica, of which there are two; the first written from Corinth about A.D. 53 to exhort them to beware of lapsing, and comforting them with the hope of the return of the Lord to judgment; the second, within a few months of the first, to correct a false impression produced by it in connection with the Lord's coming; they must not, he argued, neglect their ordinary avocations, as though the day of the Lord was close at hand; that day would not come till the powers of evil had wrought their worst, and the cup of their iniquity was full; this is the first purely dogmatic epistle of St. Paul.

THESSALONICA. See SALONICA.

THESSALY, the largest division of ancient Greece, a wide, fertile plain stretching southward from the Macedonian border to the Mallic Gulf, and entirely surrounded by mountains save the Vale of Tempe in the N.E. between Mounts Ossa and Olympus; was conquered by Philip of Macedon in the 4th century B.C., and subsequently incorporated in the Roman Empire, on the break up of which it fell into the hands of the Venetians, and eventually of the Turks (1335), and remained a portion of the Ottoman Empire till 1881, when the greater and most fertile part was ceded to Greece, the remainder following in 1919 (Chief town, Larissa).

THETFORD, a historic old market town on the Norfolk and Suffolk border, at the confluence of the Thet and Little Ouse, 31 m. SW. of Norwich; a place of importance in Saxon times, and in Edward III.'s reign an important centre of monasticism; has interesting ruins, a notable Castle Hill, and industries in brewing, tanning, &c.

THETIS, in the Greek mythology the daughter of Nereus (q.v.) and Doris, who being married against her will to Peleus, became the mother of Achilles; she was therefore a Nereid (q.v.), and gifted with prophetic foresight.

THEURIET, ANDRÉ, modern French poet and novelist, born in Marly le Roi, near Paris; studied law, and in 1857 received a post in the office of the Minister of Finance; published several volumes of poems, dealing chiefly with rustic life, but is more widely known by his novels, such as "Mademoiselle Guignon," "Le Mariage de Gérard," and "Deux Sœurs," all of them more or less tinged with melancholy, but also inspired by true poetic feeling (1833-1907).

THIALFI, in the Norse mythology the god of manual labour, Thor's henchman and attendant.

THIEPVALL, a village in the department of the Somme, France, where there was much fighting in the Great War during the battle of the Somme; Ulster troops were prominent therein, and a memorial to them was erected here later.

THIERRY, JACQUES NICOLAS AUGUSTIN, French historian, born in Blois; came early under the influence of Saint-Simon, and during 1814-1817 lived with him as secretary, assimilating his socialistic ideas and ventilating them in various compositions; Comte became his master next, and history his chief study, an outlet for his views on which he found in the Craqueur Européen, and the Courrier Français, to which he contributed his "Letters on French History" (1820); five years later appeared his masterpiece, the "Conquest of England," to be followed by "Letters on History" and "Dix Ans d'Études" (1835), in which same year he was appointed librarian at the Palais Royal. In 1853 appeared his "Tiers État," the last of his works; has been called the "father of romantic history," and was above all a historical artist, giving life and colour to his pictures of bygone ages, but not infrequently at the cost of historic accuracy (1795-1856).

THIERS, LOUIS ADOLPHE, French statesman and historian, born in Marseilles, of parents in poor circumstances; studied law at Aix, became acquainted with Mignet the historian; went with him to Paris, and took to journalism; published in 1827 his "History of the French Revolution," which established his rank as a writer; contributed to the July revolution; supported Louis Philippe, and was in 1832 elected a deputy for Aix; obtained a post in the ministry, and eventually led it; was swept out of office at the revolution of 1848; voted for the presidency of Louis Napoleon, but opposed the coup d'état; withdrew from public life for a time; published in 1860 the "History of the Consulate and the Empire," a labour of years; entered public life again, but soon retired; at the close of the Franco-German War raised the war indemnity, and saw the Germans off the soil, became head of the Provisional Government, and President of the Republic from 1871 to 1873; his histories are very one-sided, and often inaccurate besides; Carlyle's criticism of his "French Revolution" is well known, "Dig where you will, you come to water" (1797-1877).

THING, name for a legislative or judicial assembly among the Scandinavians.

THIRLMERE, one of the lakes in the English Lake District, in Cumberland, 5 m. SE. of Keswick; since 1885 its waters have been impounded for the use of Manchester, the surface raised 50 ft. by embankments, and the area more than doubled.

THIRLWALL, CONNOP, historian, born in Stepney; was a precocious child, was educated at the Charterhouse, had Grotte for a schoolfellow, and was a student of Trinity College, Cambridge; called to the bar, but took orders in 1827, having two years previously translated Schlegel's "Essay on St. Luke," and was thus the first to introduce German theology into England; wrote a "History of Greece," which, though superior in some important respects, was superseded by Grotte's as wanting in realistic power, a fatal blemish in a history; was a liberal man, and bishop of St. David's for half a lifetime (1797-1875).

THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, THE, first drawn up in 1562, state the doctrinal basis of the Church of England; they are printed in the Book of Common Prayer, and all candidates for ordination have to subscribe to them, a process repeated by any priest taking a new benefice.

THIRTY TYRANTS, name given to the committee that ruled Athens with absolute power in 404 B.C.; the following year they were overthrown by Thrasybulus.

THIRTY YEARS' WAR, the name given to a series of wars arising out of one another in Germany during 1618-1648; was first a war of Catholics against Protestants, but in its later stages developed into a struggle for supremacy in Europe. On the Catholic side were Austria, various German Catholic princes, and Spain, to whom were opposed successively Bohemia, Hungary, Denmark, Sweden, and France; originated in Bohemia, where the Protestants were goaded to revolt against the intolerance of the empire; Moravians and Hungarians came to their assistance, but the imperial forces were too powerful and the rising was suppressed, only to be renewed in 1624, when Denmark engaged the Protestant cause, but struggled vainly against Catholic armies under Wallenstein and Tilly. The tactless oppression of the Emperor Ferdinand again fanned into flame the fire of rebellion; Swedish armies now came to the assistance of the Protestants, and under Gustavus Adolphus waged successful war against the emperor, but the death of Gustavus at Lützen (1632) turned the tide in favour of the imperial forces; the German Protestant princes made a disadvantageous peace in 1635, but Sweden, now joined by France, continued the struggle against the Austrian empire. Turenne and Condé became the heroes of the war, and by a series of decisive victories rolled back the imperial armies, and by 1648 were converging upon Austria, when diplomacy brought the war to an end by the Peace of Westphalia, the chief gales of which were the securing of religious tolerance and the recognition of the independence of Switzerland and the United Provinces.

THIBSE. See PYRAMUS.

THISTLE, ORDER OF THE, an order of Scottish knighthood, sometimes called the Order of St. Andrew, instituted in 1687 by James VII. of Scotland (James II. of England); fell into abeyance during the reign of William and Mary, but was revived by Queen Anne in 1703; includes the sovereign, 10 knights, and various officials. The principal article in the insignia is a gold collar composed of thistles intertwined with sprigs of rue. Motto: "Nemo me impune lacessit"; ribbon, green; K.T., Knight of the Thistle.

THISTLEWOOD CONSPIRACY, sometimes called the Cato Street conspiracy, a plot headed by Arthur Thistlewood, aiming at the assassination of several members of the government at George III.'s funeral in 1820; the plot was discovered, and Thistlewood and four of his companions were hanged.

THOLUCK, FRIEDRICH AUGUST, theologian, born in Breslau; came under the influence of Neander (q.v.) and became professor of Theology at Halle, where he exercised a considerable influence over the many students who were attracted from far and near by his learning and fervour (1799-1877).

THOMAS, GEORGE HENRY, American general, born in Virginia; a man of fine character, lacking none of the sterner stuff of the soldier, but blended with modesty and gentleness; universally popular in the army, which he joined in 1840 and continued in till his death, rising to be general of a division through gallantry in the Indian frontier wars and in the Civil War, in which, at the battle of Nashville (1864), he completely routed the Confederate forces; had command of the military division of the Pacific at the time of his death (1816-1870).

THOMAS, SIR HUGH EVAN, British admiral. He joined the navy at the age of 14, and held commands in all parts of the world, besides being at the Admiralty at the time when naval changes were being made early this century; in 1914 he was second-in-command of the first battle cruiser squadron, and in 1916 he led a division at Jutland, a battle in which he greatly distinguished himself, for which he was knighted; he became a full admiral in 1920 and retired in 1924 (1862-1928).

THOMAS, RT. HON. JAMES HENRY, British politician. He started work when nine years old, became an engine-driver, and then turned trade union organiser; in 1910 he became President of the National Union of Railwaymen, and was elected Labour M.P. for Derby; he was made a Privy Councillor in 1917, and the same year he was sent on an official mission to the U.S.A. Always opposed to strikes when there was a chance of settlement by negotiation, he achieved considerable popularity with industrialists at the price of the enmity of the extreme section of his own party, which started to attack him for his "capitalist" evening dress, social activities, and after-dinner speeches. In 1924 he took office in the Labour Government as Colonial Secretary, and in 1929 was again in office as Lord Privy Seal, having special charge of the unemployment problem; he became Secretary for the Dominions in 1930 (1878-).

THOMSON, JOHN, the artist minister of Duddingston, born in Dalry, in Ayrshire; succeeded his father in the parish of Dalry (1800), and five years later was transferred to Duddingston parish, near Edinburgh; faithful in the discharge of his parochial duties, he yet found time to cultivate his favourite art of painting, and in the course of his 35 years' pastorate produced a series of landscapes which won him wide celebrity in his own day, and have set him in the front rank of Scottish artists (1778-1840).

THOMSON, JOHN ARTHUR, British scientist, professor of Natural History at Aberdeen; wrote a large number of books on biology, evolution, &c., and edited a number of popular works (1861-).

THOMSON, JOSEPH, African explorer, born in Thornhill, studied at Edinburgh University, and in 1878 was appointed zoologist to the Royal Geographical Society's expedition to Lake Tanganyika, which, after the death of the leader, Keith Johnston, at the start, he, at the age of 20, carried through with notable success; in 1882 explored with important geographical results Masai-land, and subsequently headed expeditions up the Niger and to Sokoto, and explored the Atlas Mountains; published interesting accounts of his various travels (1858-1894).

THOMSON, SIR JOSEPH JOHN, British scientist; Cavendish professor at Cambridge, 1884-1910, and afterwards Master of Trinity College and professor of Physics; his greatest work was done on the conduction of electricity through gases and the structure of the atom, he carried out experiments to determine the charge and mass of the electron and devised a method for the analysis of positive rays; president of the British Association at Winnipeg in 1909 (1856-).

THOMSON, SIR WILLIAM, LORD KELVIN, British physicist, born in Belfast; studied at Peterhouse, Cambridge; senior wrangler in 1845, and elected professor of Natural Philosophy at Glasgow in 1846; it was in the departments of heat and electricity that he accomplished his greatest achievements, carrying out many experiments on thermometry, the cooling of gases on expansion, and phenomena connected with electric currents; his work laid the foundations of modern thermodynamics; he also made investigations in radiation, the theory of the ether, and the age of the earth. His best-known work was the invention of the siphon recorder for the Atlantic cable, on the completion of which in 1866 he was knighted, being raised to the peerage in 1892; he invented a number of scientific instruments, including an electrometer and a sensitive galvanometer, as well as writing extensively on mathematical and physical subjects; president of the British Association at Edinburgh, 1871 (1824-1907).

THOR, in the Norse mythology "the god of thunder; the thunder was his wrath, the gathering of the black clouds is the drawing down of Thor's angry brows; the fire-bolt bursting out of heaven is the all-rending hammer flung from the hand of Thor; he urges his loud chariot over the mountain tops—that is the peal; wrathful he 'blows in his beard'—that is the rustling of the storm-blast before the thunder begins"; he is the strongest of the gods, the helper of both gods and men, and the mortal foe of the chaotic powers.

THOREAU, HENRY DAVID, an American author who, next to his friend and neighbour Emerson, gave the most considerable impulse to the "transcendental" movement in American literature; born in Concord, where his life was mostly spent, of remote French extraction; was with difficulty enabled to go to Harvard, where he graduated, but without distinction of any sort; took to desperate shifts for a living; the serious occupation of his life was to study nature in the woods around Concord, to make daily journal entries of his observations and reflections, and to preserve his soul in peace and purity; his handicrafts were unwelcome necessities thrust upon him; "What after all," he exclaims, "does the practicalness of life amount to? The things immediate to be done are very trivial. I could postpone them all to hear this locust sing. The most glorious fact in my experience is not anything I have done or may hope to do, but a transient thought or vision or dream which I have had"; his chief works are "Walden," the account of a two years' sojourn in a hut built by his own hands in the Concord Woods near "Walden Pool," "A Week on the Concord and Merrimack River," essays, poems, &c. (1817-1862).

TOYNBEE HALL, an institution in Whitechapel, London, founded in 1885 for the social welfare of the poor in the district, established in memory of Arnold Toynbee (1852-1883), who had come under Ruskin's influence and took a deep interest in the working-classes, his zeal for whose benefit shortened his life.

TRACTARIANISM, the tenets of the High Church party in the English Church advocated in "Tracts for the Times," published at Oxford between 1833 and 1841, the chief doctrine of which was that the Church, through its sacraments in the hands of a regularly-ordained clergy, is the only divinely-appointed channel of the grace of Christ.

TRADE BOARD OF, a Government office which, as now constituted, dates from 1786, but whose functions within recent times have been considerably widened; consists of a president (a Cabinet minister), and ex officio the Lord Chancellor, Archbishop of Canterbury, First Lord of the Treasury, the principal Secretaries of State, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Speaker, and others, but the actual work of the Board is left in the hands of the president and his secretarial staff.

TRADE DISPUTES ACT, a measure passed in 1906 sanctioning peaceful picketing and safeguarding union funds against seizure for damages due from individual members. Its effect was greatly to increase the power of Trade Unions, and it was modified in 1927 by the Trade Union Act (q.v.).

TRADE UNIONS, associations of workmen banded together to secure better conditions of labour. They grew up after the industrial revolution of the 18th century, and especially after the repeal in 1824 of the Anti-Combination Laws which forbade their existence. In 1871 trade unions were given full legal status, and their members were given some measure of protection, but picketing was illegal till 1876. The next step in the growth of the power of unions arose out of the legal decision in Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants in 1901, that a union was liable for damages arising from the actions of its agents; this was followed by the 1906 Trade Disputes Act (q.v.), which gave union funds complete immunity from claims for damages. In 1868 the Trade Union Congress was established, and in 1926 this body ordered a general strike in support of the miners, an action which led to some curtailment of union powers by the Trade Unions Act (q.v.). The oldest union is the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, founded in 1850.

TRADE UNIONS ACT, a measure passed in 1927 curtailing the power of trade unions; its principal clauses were those making general strikes illegal, preventing intimidation of non-strikers, and making subscription to political funds entirely voluntary by substituting a system of "contracting in" for such subscriptions for the old system of "contracting out" by those who did not want to pay.

TRAFALGAR, CAPE, on the S. coast of Spain, at the N.W. entrance of the Strait of Gibraltar; scene of naval battle in which Nelson lost his life after inflicting (October 21, 1805), a crushing defeat on the combined fleets of France and Spain.

TRAJAN, MARCUS ULPIS, Roman emperor, born in Spain; his great deeds in arms won him a consulship in 91, and in 97 Nerva invited him to be his colleague and successor; a year later he became sole emperor, ruled the empire with wisdom and vigour, set right the finances, upheld an impartial justice, and set on foot various schemes of improvement; suppressed the Christians as politically dangerous, but with no fanatic extravagance; remained above all a warrior and true leader of the legions, and crowned his military fame by his successful conquest of Dacia, in commemoration of which he is said to have erected the famous Trajan Column, which still stands in Rome (53-117).

TRAJAN'S COLUMN, a column erected by Trajan in the Forum at Rome in memory of his victory over the Dacians, and sculptured with the story of his exploits, is 125 ft. in height, and ascended by 185 steps; was surmounted by a statue of Trajan, for which Pope Sixtus V. substituted one of St. Peter.

TRAMS, road vehicles running on rails. They originated in New York in 1855, and in England Birkenhead was a pioneer in 1860. London followed the following year. In 1884 a steam cable tram was tried in London, and this was followed by the adoption of electricity; the greater mobility and saving in capital outlay of the motor omnibus has tended to render the train an obsolete form of locomotion.

TRANSCAUCASIA, an extensive tract of territory attached to the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics stretching E. and W. between the Caucasus (N.) and Turkey in Asia and Persia (S.). See CAUCASIA.

TRANSCENDENTALISM, name now principally employed to denote the great doctrine of Kant and his school, that there are principles of a priori derivation, that is, antecedent to experience, that are regulative and constitutive of not only our thoughts but our very perceptions, and the operation of which is antecedent to and sovereign over all our mental processes; such principles are denominated the categories of thought; the name is also employed to characterise every system which grounds itself on a belief in a supernatural of which the natural is but the embodiment and manifestation.

body and blood of Christ, and is known as the doctrine of the Real Presence.

TRANSVAAL, formerly SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC, a country of S.E. Africa, and forming part of the Union of South Africa, stretching northwards from the Vaal River, and bounded N. by Matabeleland, E. by Portuguese E. Africa and Swaziland, S. by Natal and the Orange River Colony, and W. by Bechuanaland and Bechuanaland Protectorate; comprises elevated plateaux, but is mountainous in the E., about the size of Italy; has a good soil and climate favourable for agriculture and stock-raising, to which latter industry the Dutch farmer chiefly devotes himself; its chief wealth, however, lies in its extremely rich deposits of gold, especially those of the "Rand," of which it exports now more than any country in the world; its advance since the gold discoveries has been great, but the trade is almost entirely in the hands of the British immigrants; Johannesburg (q.v.) is the largest town, and Pretoria the seat of Government. In 1856 the region was settled by Dutch farmers, who had "trekked" from Natal (recently annexed by Britain) to escape British Rule, as in 1835, for a similar reason, they had come from the Cape to Natal. Fierce encounters took place with the native Basutos, but in the end the Boers made good their possession. In 1877 the Republic, then in a disorganised and impoverished condition, and threatened with extinction by the natives, came under the care of the British, by whom the natives were reduced and the finances restored. In 1880 a rising of the Boers to regain complete independence resulted in the Conventions of 1881 and 1884, by which the independence of the Republic was recognised, but subject to the right of Britain to control the foreign relations. Agitations were carried on by the growing "Uitlander" population to obtain a share in the government to which they contributed in taxes the greater part of the revenue, and a succession of attempts were made by the British Government to get the Boers to concede the franchise to the "Uitlanders" and remedy other grievances; but the negotiations connected therewith were suddenly arrested by an ultimatum of date October 9, 1899, presented to the British Government by the Transvaal, and allowing them only 48 hours to accept it. It was an ultimatum they were bound to ignore, and accordingly, the time having expired on the 11th, war was declared by the Boers. It proved a costly and sanguinary one to both sides in the conflict; but the resistance of the Boers was ultimately overcome, and hostilities ceased in May, 1902. Previously to this, the Colony had been annexed by Great Britain (1900).

TRANSYLVANIA, a district in Rumania; it is a tableland enclosed N.E. and South by the Carpathians, contains wide tracts of forests, and is one-half under tillage or in pasture; yields large crops of grain and a variety of fruits, and has mines of gold, silver, copper, iron, &c.; though the manufactures and trade are insignificant; the population consists of Rumanians, Hungarians, and Germans; it was united to Hungary in 1868, and formed part of the Austrian Empire till 1919, when it was ceded to Rumania.

TUNIS, a country of North Africa, slightly larger than Portugal; since 1882 a protectorate of France; forms an eastern continuation of Algeria, fronting the Mediterranean to the N. and E. and stretching S. to the Sahara and Tripoli; is inhabited chiefly by Bedouin Arabs, presents a hilly, and in parts even mountainous, aspect; its fertile soil favours the culture of fruits, olives, wheat, and esparto, all of which are in gradually increasing amounts exported; fine marble has been recently found, and promises well. The capital is Tunis, situated at the SW. end of the Lake of Tunis, a few miles SE. of the ruined city of Carthage (q.v.); is for the most part a crowded, unwholesome place, but contains well-supplied bazaars, finely decorated mosques, the bey's palace, a citadel, and is showing signs of improvement under French management.

TUNSTALL, a market town of Staffordshire, 4½ m. NE. of Newcastle-under-Lyme, is a coal-centre, with manufactures of earthenware and iron.

TUPPER, SIR CHARLES, Canadian statesman. Abandoning a medical career, he entered the Nova Scotia legislature in 1855, and became premier of that province in 1864, working for the unification of a Canadian Dominion, an outcome he lived to see; after holding various political posts in Canada he became high commissioner in London for three years from 1884; in 1895 he became premier of Canada, only being in office for a few weeks (1821-1916).

TUPPER, MARTIN FARQUHAR, author of "Proverbial Philosophy," born in Marylebone; bred to the bar; wrote some 40 works, but the "Philosophy" (1858), though little read now, had a quite phenomenal success, having sold in hundreds of thousands, as well as being translated into various foreign languages (1810-1889).

TURENNE, VICOMTE DE (Henri de la Tour d'Auvergne), a famous marshal of France, born in Sedan of noble parentage; was trained in the art of war under his uncles Maurice and Henry of Nassau in Holland, and entered the French service in 1630 under the patronage of Richelieu; gained great renown during the Thirty Years' War; during the wars of the Fronde (q.v.) first sided with the "Frondeurs," but subsequently joined Mazarin and the court party; crushed his former chief Condé; invaded successfully the Spanish Netherlands, and so brought the revolt to an end; was created Marshal-General of France in 1660; subsequently conducted to a triumphant issue wars within Spain (1667), Holland (1672), and during 1674 conquered and devastated the Palatinate, but during strategical operations conducted against the Austrian general Montecuccoli was killed by a cannon-ball (1611-1675).

TURGENEV, IVAN, Russian writer. He was the first of his contemporaries to achieve international fame, and was also the inventor of the phrase "Nihilists" to describe the Russian anarchist movement; he was a keen progressive thinker, and lived for many years in Paris. Among his works are "Budin," "Fathers and Sons," "Virgin Soil"; he was a master of prose, and also of the art of short story writing (1818-1891).

TURGOT, ANNE ROBERT JACQUES, BARON DE L'AULNE, French statesman, born in Paris, of Norman descent; early embraced the doctrines of the philosophes party, and held for 13 years the post of intendant of Limoges, the affairs of which he administered with ability, and was in 1774 called by Louis XVI. to the management of the national finances, which he proceeded to do on economical principles, but in all his efforts was thwarted by the privileged classes, and in some 20 months was compelled to resign and leave the matter to the fates, he himself retiring into private life (1727-1781).

TURN, a celebrated city of North Italy, a former capital of Piedmont, 80 m. NW. of Genoa; although one of the oldest of Italian cities it presents quite a modern appearance, with handsome streets, statues, squares, gardens, a Renaissance cathedral, palaces, university (over 2000 students), large library, colleges, and museums, &c.; manufactures are chiefly of textiles; has an interesting history from the time of its first mention in Hannibal's day.

TURKISTAN, a wide region in Central Asia, divided by the Pamir plateau into sections: (1) Western Turkistan, which embraces Russian Turkistan, the Khanates of Khiva (q.v.) and Bokhara (q.v.), and Afghan Turkistan. (2) Eastern Turkistan, formerly called Chinese Turfary; unproductive in many parts, and but sparsely populated; produces some gold, and a considerable quantity of silk, besides linens and cottons.

TURKEY, consists of: Turkey in Asia, an area of 285,000 sq. m., extending from the Egean Sea to Persia and from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean, and comprising all what is usually called Asia Minor. Turkey in Europe, is an area of 10,000 sq. m. on the European side of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, consisting of Eastern Thrace, Constantinople, and Adrianople. Since 1923 Turkey has been a republic with Angora as the seat of government. Brusa, Kalamish, and Sivas are other important towns; Smyrna, Constantinople, and Chank are ports. Agriculture is the occupation of the people, opium, tobacco, carpets, cotton, and fruits are the main exports; the country is rich in forests, and has potential mineral wealth; an extensive silk industry is carried on; there are more than 2000 m. of railway and some good roads. Most of the people are of the Islam faith. Politically the land is ruled by a President and National Assembly. Of Central Asian origin the Turks or Ottomans conquered the Eastern Roman Empire, and captured Constantinople in 1453, spreading later throughout the Balkans, even reaching Hungary. From 1700 on parts of the Ottoman Empire broke away; after the Treaty of London that ended the first Balkan War in 1913 the boundary of Turkey in Europe became a line from Enos to Midia, thus excluding Adrianople, which was regained in the second Balkan War; after the Great War Turkey was forced to cede Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and all her other Arabian possessions. In 1923 the Sultan was finally deposed, and the country began to advance socially on Western lines; education improved vastly, but few of the Turks show gifts for art or literature. The growth of the new Turkey and its nationalist spirit was in a large measure due to Mustafa Kemal (q.v.), who set up his own government at Angora in 1923, and who led an army against Greece, defeated her, and by so doing gained better terms for the redrafting of Turkey's borders than had been proposed.

TURNER, CHARLES TENNYSON, an elder brother of Alfred Tennyson; vicar of Greshy, Lincoln; a man of fine nature and delicate susceptibility as a poet, whose friendship and "heart union" with his greater brother is revealed in "Poems by Two Brothers"; assumed the additional name of Turner in 1838 (1808-1879).

UNEARNED INCREMENT, increase in the value of land or any property without expenditure of any kind on the part of the proprietor.

UNEMPLOYMENT in serious volume has existed since the industrial revolution at the end of the 18th century, and in normal times occurs in cycles, boom in trade following depression at fairly regular intervals. The trade unions were the first to tackle the problem of maintaining the unemployed during bad spells as far as their members were concerned, and in 1912 compulsory State insurance against unemployment came into force, workers and employers both contributing towards the cost. After the Great War the volume of unemployment in Great Britain rose to over a million, and the question of getting these men back to work became a political issue of the first order, successive governments trying remedies with scant result.

UNITED STATES, the great Western republic; occupies an area nearly as large as all Europe, bounded on the N. by the Dominion of Canada, on the E. by the Atlantic, on the S. by Mexico and the Gulf, and on the W. by the Pacific, extending 2700 m. from E. to W., and on an average 1600 m. from N. to S.; there are two great mountain systems, the Appalachians on the E., and the Rockies, the Cascade ranges, &c., on the W., which divide the territory into four regions—an eastern, which slopes from the Appalachians to the Atlantic, the more settled and most thickly populated part; a central, which slopes N., formed by the Mississippi Valley, a vast undulating plain, largely agricultural and pastoral; a plateau supported by the Rocky and Cascade ranges, a metalliferous region; and a territory with the valley of the Sacramento, which slopes to the Pacific, of varied resources. The great rivers are in the Mississippi Valley, though there are important rivers both for navigation and water-power on the Atlantic and Pacific slopes. The climate is of every variety, from sub-arctic to sub-tropic, with extremes both as regards temperature and moisture, in consequence of which the vegetation is varied. The mineral wealth is immense, and includes, besides large beds of coal, all the useful metals. Large forests of valuable timber still exist in the Eastern States, while agriculture and cotton-growing are flourishing industries. As a manufacturing country the United States has built up a commanding position. Its vast resources, exploited to the utmost by the virile population, have brought great wealth which was notably increased by the position in which it found itself during the early years of the Great War. Railways, canals, and telegraphic and telephonic communications have been developed with great enterprise and energy. There are over 260,000 miles of railways in operation; of the waterways over 26,000 miles are navigable; there are over 3,000,000 miles of roads; and the annual tonnage cleared at the various seaports is over 83,000,000. The population is mostly of British and German descent, but there is a large foreign-born population drawn from all European countries, about eleven million negroes, and over 350,000 Indians. The government is a federal republic of 48 states, 1 federal district, and 2 organized territories. The executive power is vested in a President, who is elected for four years, is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and appoints the Cabinet officers. The legislature consists of two houses—a Senate, each State electing two members for six years and a House of Representatives, each State electing members for two years in proportion to its population, one representative being allotted for 211,877 citizens.

He was a man of superlative adroitness of faculty and shiftness, without aught that can be called great, but more than any other the incarnation of the spirit of his time; said the word which all were waiting to hear, the word which gave the death-blow to superstition, but left religion out in the cold. The general, the great, offence (early charges Voltaire with is that "he intermeddled in religion without being himself in any measure religious; that he entered the Temple and continued there with a levity which, in any temple where men worship, can becom to brother man; that, in a word, he ardently, and with long-continued effort, warred against Christianity, without understanding, beyond the mere superficial, what Christianity was" (1694-1778).

VULGATE, a version of the Bible in Latin executed by St. Jerome (q.v.), which was in two centuries after its completion universally adopted in the Western Christian Church as authoritative for both faith and practice, from the circumstance of its general reception it became known as the Vulgate (i.e. the commonly accepted Bible of the Church), and is the version accepted as authentic to-day by the Roman Catholic Church, under sanction of the Council of Trent. "With the publication of it," says Ruskin, "the great deed of fixing, in their ever since undisturbed harmony and majesty, the canon of Mosiac and Apostolic Scripture, was virtually accomplished, and the series of historic and didactic books which form our present Bible (including the Apocrypha) were established in and above the nascent thought of the noblest races of men living on the terrestrial globe, as a direct message to them from its Maker, containing whatever it was necessary for them to learn of His purposes towards them, and commanding, or advising, with divine authority and infallible wisdom, all that it was best for them to do and happiest to desire. Thus, partly as a scholar's exercise and partly as an old man's recreation, the severity of the Latin language was softened, like Venetian crystal, by the variable fire of Hebrew thought, and the 'Book of Books' took the abiding form of which all the future art of the Western nations was to be an hourly expanding interpretation."

WALLER, EDMUND, poet, born in Colchill, Bucks, to great wealth, and educated at Eton and Cambridge; early gave evidence of his genius for poetry, which, however, was limited in practice to the production of merely occasional pieces; he was in great favour at Court; was a member of the Long Parliament; lent to the Royalist side, though he wrote a panegyric on Cromwell, which is considered his best poem; in addition to a number of odes he wrote several lyrics, including the well-known "Go, Lovely Rose"; a founder of the classical school of poetry, he revived, or rather "re-modelled," the heroic couplet form of verse, which continued in vogue for over a hundred years after (1606-1687).

WALLONS, name given to the descendants of the ancient Belgæ, a race of mixed Celtic and Romanic stock, inhabiting Belgium chiefly, and speaking a language called Walloon, a kind of Old French; in Belgium they number to-day two and a quarter millions.

WALPOLE, HORACE, Earl of Orford, third son of the following; born in London, educated at Eton and Cambridge; travelled on the Continent with Gray, the poet, who had been a schoolfellow, but quarrelled with him, and came home alone; entered Parliament in 1741, and continued a member till 1768, but took little part in the debates; succeeded to the earldom in 1791; his tastes were literary; wrote "Anecdotes of Painting in England," and inaugurated a new era in novel-writing, with his "Castle of Otranto" (1764), but it is by his "Letters" he will live in English literature, which, "malicious, light as froth, but amusing, retail," as Stopford Brooke remarks, "with liveliness all the gossip of the time"; he is characterised by Carlyle as "one of the clearest-sighted men of his century; a determined despiser and merciless dissector of cant" (1717-1797).

WALPOLE, SIR ROBERT, Earl of Orford, Whig statesman, born in Houghton, Norfolk, educated at Eton and Cambridge; entered Parliament in 1701, and became member for King's Lynn in 1702; was favoured by the Whig leaders, and promoted to office in the Cabinet; was accused of corruption by the opposite party when in power, and committed to the Tower; on his release after acquittal was re-elected for King's Lynn; in 1715 became First Lord of the Treasury, and in 1721 became Prime Minister, which he continued to be for twenty-one years, but not without opposition on account of his pacific policy; on being driven against his will into a war with Spain, which proved unsuccessful, he retired into private life; he stood high in repute for his financial policy; it was he who established the first Sinking Fund, and who succeeded as a financier in restoring confidence after the bursting of the South Sea Bubble (q.v.); it is to his policy in defeating the plans of the Jacobites that the Hanoverian dynasty in great part owe their permanent occupancy of the British throne; it was a favourite maxim of his, "Every man has his price," and he was mortified to find that Pitt could not be bought by any bribe of his (1678-1745).

WALPURG'S NIGHT, the eve of May 1, when the witches hold high revel and offer sacrifices to the devil their chief, the scene of their festival in Germany being the Brocken (q.v.). This annual festival, in the popular belief, was conceded to them in recompense for the loss they sustained when by St. Walpurga (abbess of Heidenheim, d. 778) the Saxons were persuaded to renounce paganism with its rites for Christianity.

WALSINGHAM, SIR FRANCIS, English statesman, born in Chislehurst; was ambassador at Paris, and was there during the St. Bartholomew massacre, and was afterwards appointed one of Queen Elizabeth's Secretaries of State; he was an insidious inquisitor, and had numerous spies in his pay, whom he employed to ferret out evidence to his ruin against Mary, Queen of Scots; and he had the audacity to sit as one of the Commissioners at her trial (1576-1590).

WALSTON, ST., patron saint of husbandmen, of British birth; gave up wealth for agriculture, and died at the plough; is represented with a scythe in his hand and cattle near him.

WALTER, JOHN, London printer; the founder proper, though his father was the projector, of the Times newspaper, and forty years in the management of it, under which it became the "leading journal" of the day, a success due to his discernment and selection of the men with the ability to conduct it (1773-1847).

WALTER THE PENNILESS, a famous mob leader, adjutant of Peter the Hermit (q.v.) in the first Crusade.

WALTON, IZAAK, the angler, born in Stafford; settled as a linen-draper, first in Fleet Street and then in Chancery Lane, London; married a lady, a grand-niece of Cranmer, and on her death a sister of Bishop Ken, by whom he had several children; he associated with some of the best clergymen of the Church of England, among the number Dr. Donne, and was much beloved by them; on the death of his second wife he went to Winchester and stayed with his friend Dr. Morley, the bishop; his principal work was the "Compleat Angler; or, the Contemplative Man's Recreation," which was extended by his friend Charles Cotton, and is a classic to this day; he wrote in addition Lives of Hooker, Dr. Donne, Bishop Sanderson, Sir Henry Wotton, and George Herbert, all done, like the "Angler," in a unique, charming, simple style (1593-1683).

WALTON, SIR J. LAWSON, British lawyer and politician. After a distinguished legal career he entered politics as a Liberal, and in 1906 became Attorney-General (1840-1908).

WANDERING JEW. See JEW, WANDERING.

WAPENSCHAW, originally settlements of the people of a district in ancient times in Scotland, at which every man was bound to appear duly armed according to his rank, and make exhibition of his skill in the use of his weapons, against a time of war.

WAR GRAVES COMMISSION, THE IMPERIAL, a body set up in 1917 to maintain the graves of British soldiers killed in the Great War; it sees to the upkeep of cemeteries in all parts of the world where there was fighting, and held itself responsible for the erection of headstones and for the identification of the dead.

WAR, THE GREAT, the great international conflict between Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria and the Allies (i.e., of whom Britain, France, and Russia were the chief; for the first time in history whole nations and not merely armies were at war, some 30 million men being under arms, and poison gas, aeroplanes, and other scientific ways of fighting were introduced; the total cost in human life was 10 million, while millions more were disabled. The war arose out of the assassination of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the throne of Austria, by a Serb at Sarajevo on June 28, 1914; stringent demands for satisfaction were made by Austria, and although Serbia agreed to eight out of ten of them and was willing to refer the other two points to the Hague Conference, Austria, with assurances of German support, broke off relations with Serbia, and formally declared war on July 28. Russia at once mobilized in support of Serbia, and Germany retaliated by declaring war on Russia, whose ally, France, was next brought into the conflict. German troops on August 1 crossed the frontiers of Luxembourg and Belgium, an action which brought forth an ultimatum from Britain, who was a signatory to the treaty guaranteeing Belgian neutrality. On August 4 Great Britain declared war on Germany, and fighting went on in Flanders, France, Italy, the Balkans, Mesopotamia, East Africa, China, and on the high seas, for four years. In the Western Front hostilities were ended by an armistice on November 11, 1918; but the official date for the termination of the war was August 31, 1921.

WARBECK, PERKIN, an impostor who affected to be Richard, Duke of York, second son of Edward IV., alleged to have been murdered in the Tower, and laid claim to the crown of England in preference to Henry VII. In an attempt to make good this claim he was taken prisoner, and hanged at Tyburn in 1499.

WARBURTON, WILLIAM, an English divine, born in Newark; was bishop of Gloucester; was author of the famous "Divine Legation of Moses," characterized by Gibbon as a "monument of the vigour and weakness of the human mind"; is a distracted waste of misapplied logic and learning; a singular friendship existed between the author and Pope (1698-1779).

WARD, ARTEMUS, the pseudonym of C. F. Browne (q.v.).

WARD, EDWARD MATTHEW, British artist; became an R.A.; he is remembered as the painter of several of the frescoes in the Houses of Parliament (1816-1879).

WARD, MRS. HUMPHRY, English authoress, born in Hobart, Tasmania; a niece of Matthew Arnold; translated Amiel's "Journal," a suggestive record, but is best known by her romance of Robert Elanore, published in 1888, a novel dealing with religious problems; this was followed by "David Grieve," "Sir George Tremedy," "The Marriage of William Ashe," dealing with political life, and other stories (1851-1920).

WARD, SIR LESLIE, a famous British cartoonist, who as "Spy" contributed to Punch and Funny Folks; he was also a portrait painter of merit (1851-1900).

WARD, WILLIAM GEORGE, English theologian; was a zealous promoter of the Tractarian Movement, and led the way in carrying out its principles to their logical issue by joining the Church of Rome; he was a broad-minded man withal, and was the regard of men of every school; became editor of the Dublin Review (1812-1882).

WARREN, SAMUEL, novelist, born in Denbighshire; studied for the law, became Q.C. and Recorder of Hull; member of Parliament 1836-1859; author of "Ten Thousand a Year" and "Diary of a Late Physician" (1807-1877).

WARS OF THE ROSES, name given to a civil war in England from 1455 to 1485, between the Houses of York and Lancaster, so called from the badge of the former being a white rose and that of the latter being a red; the first battle was that of St. Albans, 1455, and the last Bosworth, 1485; it terminated with the accession of Henry VII., who united in his person the rival claims.

WARSAW, the capital of Poland, stands on the left bank of the Vistula, 700 m. SW. of Leningrad; is almost in the heart of Europe, and in a position with many natural advantages; is about as large as Birmingham, and has a university with 75 professors and over 1000 students; has a large trade and numerous manufactures, including iron and steel goods. It superseded Cracow as the capital of Poland in 1696.

WARTBURG, an old, grim castle overlooking Eisenach (q.v.); where Luther was confined by his friends when it was not safe for him outside, and where, not forgetful of what he owed his country, he kept translating the Bible into the German vernacular; the oaken table at which he wrote, and the oaken ink-holder which he threw at the devil's head, are still shown, as well as the ink spot which the latter left on the wall.

WARTON, THOMAS, English poet, born in Reading-stoke; was professor of Poetry at Oxford, and Poet Laureate; wrote a "History of English Poetry" of great merit, and a few poetic pieces in faint echo of others by Pope and Swift for most part (1728-1790).

WARWICK, the county town of Warwickshire, on the Avon, 21 m. SE. of Birmingham; it dates from Saxon times, and possesses a great baronial castle, the residence of the earls of Warwick, erected in 1304 on an eminence by the river grandly overlooking the town. It is the seat of several industries, and has a considerable trade in agricultural produce.

WARWICK, RICHARD NEVILLE, EARL OF, eldest son of the Earl of Salisbury and known as "the king-maker" (q.v.); fought in the Wars of the Roses, and was in the end defeated by Edward IV. at the battle of Barnet and slain (1428-1471).

WARWICKSHIRE, central county of England; is traversed by the Avon, a tributary of the Severn; the north portion, which was at one time covered by the forest of Arden, is now, from its mineral wealth, one of the busiest industrial centres of England; it contains the birthplace of Shakespeare; Birmingham is the largest town.

WASH, THE, an estuary on the E. coast of England, between the counties of Norfolk and Lincoln, too shallow for navigation.

WASHINGTON, capital of the United States, in the district of Columbia, on the left bank of the Potomac, 35 m. SW. of Baltimore; was founded in 1791, and made the seat of the Government in 1800; it is regularly laid out, possesses a number of noble buildings, many of them of marble, the chief being the Capitol, an imposing structure, where the Senate and Congress sit; near it, 1½ m. distant, is the White House, the residence of the President, standing in grounds beautifully laid out and adorned with fountains and shrubbery.

WASHINGTON, a NW. State of the U.S.A., twice the size of Ireland; lies N. of Oregon; is traversed by the Cascade Mountains, the highest 8138 ft., and has a rugged surface of hill and valley, but is a great wheat-growing and grazing territory, covered on the W. by forests of pine and cedar; Olympia is the capital. Washington is the name of hundreds of other places in the States.

WASHINGTON, GEORGE, one of the founders and first President of the United States, born in Bridges Creek, Westmoreland Co., Virginia, of a family from the North of England, who emigrated in the middle of the 17th century, commenced his public life in defending the colony against the encroachments of the French, and served as a captain in a campaign against them under General Braddock; in the contest between the colony and the mother-country he espoused the cause of the colony, and was in 1775 appointed commander-in-chief; his first important operation in that capacity was to drive the English out of Boston, but, the British rallying, he was defeated at Brandywine and Germantown in 1777, next year, in alliance with the French, he drove the British out of Philadelphia, and in 1781 compelled Cornwallis to capitulate in an attack he made on Yorktown, and on the evacuation of New York by the British the independence of America was achieved, upon which he resigned the command; in 1789 he was elected to the Presidency of the Republic, and in 1793 was re-elected, at the end of which term he retired into private life after paying a dignified farewell (1732-1799).

WASHINGTON CONFERENCE, a meeting of the five great naval powers—Britain, the U.S.A., Japan, France, and Italy—held at Washington in 1921. It agreed to an international limitation of the building of battleships.

WATERBURY, a city of Connecticut, U.S., 88 m. N.E. of New York, with manufacture of metallic wares; world-famous for its cheap watches.

WATERFORD, a town in a county of the same name, in Munster, Ireland, at the junction of the Suir and the Barrow. Has a splendid harbour formed by the estuary, and carries on an extensive export trade with England, particularly in bacon and butter, the chief industries of the county being cattle-breeding and dairy-farming.

WATERLOO, a village 11 m. S. of Brussels, which gives name to a battle in which the French under Napoleon were defeated by an army under Wellington on June 18, 1815.

WATERLOO BRIDGE, a bridge across the Thames from the Strand between Blackfriars Bridge and Charing Cross. It has nine arches each with a span of 120 ft., is built of granite and was built by Rennie, opened in 1817, and reconstructed after it was found to be collapsing in 1924.

WATKIN, SIR EDWARD, British railway pioneer. In 1845 he joined the Board of the old Trent Valley Railway, and later extended his connection to a number of companies operating in the Midlands; he was largely responsible for the formation of the Great Central Railway (1819-1901).

WATSON, SIR WILLIAM, English poet, born in Yorkshire; the first poem which procured him recognition was "Wordsworth's Grave," and his subsequent poems have confirmed the impression produced, in especial his "Lachrymæ Musæum," one of the finest tributes paid to the memory of Tennyson on the occasion of his death; among his later productions the most important is a volume entitled "Odes and other Poems," published in 1894; also wrote an admirable volume of essays, "Excursions in Criticism" (1858-).

WATT, the unit of power on the metric system in general use for electrical purposes; 746 watts are equivalent to one horse power; the Board of Trade unit of electrical supply is the kilowatt-hour, i.e. the energy necessary to run an engine of power 1000 watts for one hour; the power of a circuit in watts is calculated by multiplying the amperes by the volts.

WATT, JAMES, inventor of the modern steam-engine, born in Greenock, son of a merchant; began life as a mathematical instrument maker, opened business in Glasgow under university patronage, and early began to experiment on the mechanical capabilities of steam; when, in 1763, he was engaged in repairing the model of a Newcomen's engine, he hit upon the idea which has immortalised his name. This was the idea of a separate condenser for the steam, and from that moment the power of steam in the civilization of the world was assured; the advantages of the invention were soon put to the proof and established, and by a partnership on the part of Watt with Matthew Boulton (q.v.) Watt had the satisfaction of seeing his idea fairly launched and of reaping the fruits. Prior to Watt's invention the steam-engine was of little other use than for pumping water (1736-1819).

WATTEAU, ANTOINE, celebrated French painter and engraver, born in Valenciennes; his pictures were numerous and the subjects almost limited to pseudo-pastoral rural groups; the tone of the colouring is pleasing and the design graceful (1684-1721).

WATTS, GEORGE FREDERICK, eminent English painter, born in London; is distinguished as a painter at once of historical subjects, ideal subjects, and portraits; did one of the frescoes in the Poets' Hall of the Houses of Parliament and the cartoon of "Cæsar at the Triumph through the Streets of Rome"; has, as a "poet-painter," by his "Love and Death," "Hope," and "Orpheus and Eurydice," achieved a world-wide fame, he was twice over offered a baronetcy, but on both occasions declined (1817-1904).

WATTS, ISAAC, Nonconformist divine, born in Southampton, son of a schoolmaster; chose the ministry as his profession, was for a time pastor of a church in Mark Lane, but after a succession of attacks of illness he resigned and went on a visit to his friend Sir Thomas Abney, with whom he stayed for 36 years, after which time his friend died, and he resumed pastoral duties as often as his health permitted; he wrote several books, among which was a book on "Logic," long a university text-book, and a great number of hymns, many of them of wide fame and much cherished as helps to devotion (1674-1748).

WATTS-DUNTON, THEODORE, author, poet, and critic, born in St. Ives, bosom friend of Swinburne, who pronounced him "the first critic of our time—perhaps the largest-minded and surest sighted of any age"; his influence was great, and it was exercised chiefly through contributions to the periodicals of the day; having been early brought into contact with gipsy life, he wrote the romance of "Aylwin," later editing some of the works of George Borrow; of his poems, "The Coming of Love" and "Christmas at the Mermaid" are best known; he assumed the surname of Dunton after his mother (1836-1914).

WAUGH, EDWIN, a Lancashire poet, born in Rochdale, bred a bookseller; wrote, among other productions, popular songs, full of original native humour, the first of them "Come Whom to thy Childer and Me" (1817-1890).

WEI-HAI-WEI, a town in a deep bay on the Shantung promontory, China, 40 m. E. of Chefoo, and nearly opposite Port Arthur, which is situated on the northern side of the entrance to the Gulf of Pechili; was leased to Great Britain in 1898, together with the islands in the bay and a belt of land along the coast; its harbour is well sheltered, and accommodates a large number of vessels; in 1895 was the scene of a battle between the Japanese and Chinese, the former capturing the town.

WEIMAR, capital of the grand duchy of Saxe-Weimar, in a valley on the left bank of the Ilm, 13 m. E. of Erfurt, and famous as for many years the residence of the great Goethe and the illustrious literary circle of which he was the centre, an association which constitutes the chief interest of the place.

WEINGARTNER, FELIX, composer and musical conductor, born in Zara, Dalmatia; composed symphonic poems, operas, and songs (1863-).

WEISMANN, AUGUST, biologist, born in Frankfurt-on-the-Main; studied medicine at Göttingen; devoted himself to the study of zoology, the first fruit of which was a treatise on the "Development of Diptera," and at length to the variability in organisms on which the theory of descent, with modifications, is based, the fruit of which was a series of papers published in 1882 under the title of "Studies on the Theory of Descent"; but it is with the discussions on the question of heredity that his name is most intimately associated. The accepted theory on the subject assumed that characters acquired by the individual are transmitted to offspring, and this assumption, in his "Essays upon Heredity," he maintains to be wholly groundless, and denies that it has any foundation in fact; heredity, according to him, is due to the continuity of the germ plasma, or the transmission from generation to generation of a substance of a uniform chemical and molecular composition (1834-1914).

WEISENFELD, a town of Prussian Saxony, 35 m. SW. of Leipzig, with an old castle of the Duke of Weissenfels and various manufactures.

WELLESLEY, RICHARD COWLEY, MARQUIS OF, statesman and administrator, born in Dublin, eldest son of the Earl of Mornington, an Irish peer, and eldest brother of the Duke of Wellington, his senior by nine years; educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he distinguished himself in classics. In 1781 succeeded his father in the Irish House of Peers; entered Parliament in 1784, was a supporter of Pitt, and in 1797 appointed Governor-General of India in succession to Cornwallis, and raised to the English peerage as Baron Wellesley. In this capacity he proved himself a great administrator, and by clearing out the French and crushing the power of Tippecoo Sahib, as well as increasing the revenue of the East India Company, laid the foundation of the British power in India, for which he was raised to the marquessate, and voted a pension of £5000; he afterwards became Foreign Secretary of State and Viceroy of Ireland (1760-1842).

WELLSHAUSEN, JULIUS, Old Testament scholar, born in Hameln; held the post of professor of Theology at Greifswald, but resigned the post from conscientious scruples and became professor of Oriental Languages at Marburg in 1865; is best known as a Biblical critic on the lines of the higher criticism, the criticism which seeks to arrange the different parts of the Bible in their proper historical connection and order (1844-1918).

WELLINGBOROUGH, a market town in Northamptonshire, 10 m. N.E. of Northampton, has some fine buildings; the manufacture of shoes a chief industry.

WELLINGTON, the capital of New Zealand since 1865, is built round the landlocked harbour of Port Nicholson in North Island, was founded 1840; big reclamation works have greatly increased the size of the city in late years; contains Governor's House, Houses of Parliament and head Government offices; has large commercial, railway, and shipping interests.

WELLINGTON, ARTHUR WELLESLEY, DUKE OF, born probably in Dublin, third son of the Earl of Mornington, an Irish peer, educated first at Chelsea, then at Eton, and then at a military school at Angers, in France; entered the army in 1787 as an ensign in the 73rd, and stepped gradually upwards in connection with different regiments, till in 1798 he became Lieutenant-Colonel of the 83rd; was for a time in the Irish Parliament as a member for Trim, and went in 1794 to the Netherlands, and served in a campaign there which had disastrous issues, such as disgusted him with military life, and was about to leave the army when he was sent to India, where he distinguished himself in the storming of Seringapatam, and in the command of the war against the Marhattas, which he brought to a successful issue in 1805, returning home in 1806; next year he entered the Imperial Parliament, and in 1807 was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland. In 1808 he left for Portugal, where he was successful against the French in several engagements, and in 1809 was appointed commander-in-chief of the Peninsular army; in this capacity his generalship became conspicuous in a succession of victories, in which he drove the French first out of Portugal and then out of Spain, defeating them finally at Toulouse on April 12, 1814, and so ending the Peninsular War; upon his return home he was created a duke, and had voted to him from the public treasury a grant of £400,000; on the return of Napoleon from Elba he was appointed general of the allies against him in the Netherlands, and on June 18, 1815, defeated him in the ever memorable battle of Waterloo; this was the crowning feat in Wellington's military life, and the nation showed its gratitude to him for his services by presenting him with the estate of Stratfieldsaye, in Hampshire, worth £263,000, the price paid for it to Lord Rivers, the proprietor; in 1827 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army, and in 1828 was Prime Minister of the State; as a statesman he was opposed to Parliamentary reform, but he voted for the emancipation of the Catholics and the abolition of the Corn Laws; he died in Walmer Castle on September 1, 1852, and was buried beside Nelson in a crypt of St. Paul's (1769-1852).

WELLINGTON COLLEGE, a college founded in 1853 at Wokingham, Berks, in memory of the Duke of Wellington, primarily for the education of the sons of deceased military officers; there are a classical school to prepare for the university and a modern side to prepare for the army.

WELLS, a small episcopal city in Somersetshire, 20 m. SW. of Bath, its bishopric being joined with that of the latter city; it derives its name from hot springs near it, and is possessed of a beautiful cruciform cathedral in the Early English style, adorned with some 600 statues of saints, 151 of which are life-size, and some of them colossal.

WELLS, CHARLES JEREMIAH, English poet, born in London; author of a dramatic poem entitled "Joseph and his Brethren," published in 1824, a poem which failed to attract attention at the time, and the singular merits of which were first recognized by Swinburne in 1875, the author having meantime given up literature for the law, to which he had been bred (1800-1879).

WELLS, HERBERT GEORGE, British novelist. Born in Bromley, of poor parents, he left school at 13 and worked, first in the drapery trade and later as a pupil-teacher; taking to drapery again, he then had a second attempt at teaching, and obtained a scholarship to the Royal College of Science, South Kensington, where he studied under Huxley and took his B.Sc. with honours. Teaching and journalism then brought him a small income, and in 1895 he published "The Time Machine," his first novel; "The Invisible Man," and the "War of the Worlds" soon followed, but the public was slow to recognize his merit. His first books were mainly scientific romances like "The War in the Air"; but in 1900 he turned to ordinary romantic novels with "Love and Mr. Lewisham," followed by "Kipps," "Tono-Bungay," and "Mr. Polly." In 1918 "Mr. Britling Sees It Through" appeared, and marked the start of a third phase of Wells's writing; it preceded "God, the Invisible King," and a host of ethical works published as novels, all preaching the Wellian view of life, viz., that we could plan things better; it was partly to preach the doctrine of human brotherhood that he produced after the Great War an "Outline of History" (1946).

WELSH, DAVID, a Scottish divine, a gentlemanly, scholarly man, professor of Church History in the University of Edinburgh; was Moderator of the General Assembly on the occasion of the Disruption of the Scottish Church (1843), and headed the secession on the day of the exodus (1793-1845).

WELSH, or WELCH, JOHN, a Scottish divine, a Nitidale man; became Presbyterian minister of Ayr, and was distinguished both as a preacher and for his sturdy opposition to the ecclesiastical tyranny of James VI., for which later he suffered imprisonment and exile; he was an ancestor of Jane Welsh Carlyle, and was married to a daughter of John Knox, who, when the king thought to win her over by offering her husband a bishopric, held out her apron before sovereign majesty, and threatened she would rather keep (catch) his head there than that he should live and be a bishop; she figures in the chapter in "Sartor" on Aprons, as one of Carlyle's apron-worthies (1570-1822).

WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISTS, the largest Nonconformist body in Wales, of native growth, that originated in the middle of the 18th century in connection with a great religious awakening; has an ecclesiastical constitution on Presbyterian lines, and is in alliance with the Presbyterian Church of England; it consists of 1340 churches, and has a membership of many thousands on its communion roll, with two theological seminaries, one at Trevecca and one at Bala.

WELSHPOOL, town in Montgomeryshire, North Wales, on the left bank of the Severn, 10 m. W. of Shrewsbury, the manufacture of flannels and woollen goods being the chief industry.

WELWYN, a district in Hertfordshire that used to be a small village, 22 m. N. of London; in 1920 a garden suburb was founded and the place grew rapidly.

WEMBLEY, a suburb of London in Middlesex, where in 1924 a mammoth British Empire Exhibition was held; a sports stadium, built in that year, and capable of holding 100,000 spectators, became the venue of the football Cup Final.

WEMYSS, LORD ROSELYN ERSKINE, British admiral. Entering the navy at the age of 13, he became a captain in 1801 and took the Duke and Duchess of York (afterwards King George V. and Queen Mary) on their Empire tour in the Ophir. He saw active service in Gallipoli in 1915, and from 1917 to 1918 was First Sea Lord (1864-).

WENCESLAS, hero of a famous carol telling of his goodness to the poor. He is usually assumed to be Wenceslas, king of Bohemia in the 10th century, who was converted to Christianity and who founded several churches in Prague and other parts of the country; while on his way to Mass on September 28, 935, he was murdered by his brother; buried at St. Vitus's Cathedral, Prague, he was later canonized.

WENDS, a horde of savage Slavs who, about the 6th century, invaded and took possession of vacant lands on the southern shores of the Baltic, and extended their incursions as far as Hamburg and the ocean, south also far over the Elbe in some quarters, and were a source of great trouble to the Germans in Henry the Fowler's time, and after; they burst in upon Brandenburg once, in "never-imagined fury," and stamped out, as they thought, the Christian religion there by wholesale butchery of its priests, setting up for worship their own god "Triglaph, ugliest and stupidest of all false gods," described as "something like three whales' cuts combined by boiling, or a tripe porpoise dead-drunk." They were at length beaten by Albert the Bear and reduced to subjection; remnants of them, with their language and customs, exist in Lusatia to this day.

WENER, LAKE, the largest lake in Sweden, in the SW., 150 ft. above the sea-level and 100 m. long by 50 m. of utmost breadth; contains several islands, and abounds in fish.

WEREWOLF, a person transformed into a wolf, or a being with a literally wolfish appetite, under the presumed influence of a charm or some demonic possession; the origin of belief in this power (known as lycanthropy) is very old, being associated with the legends of ghouls and vampires; it was once prevalent throughout Europe.

WERNER, ANTON ALEXANDER VON, German painter. Born in Frankfurt-on-Oder, he studied in Berlin and Paris, and in 1875 was made principal of the Academy of Arts, Berlin; he is best known for his historical pictorial works, "The Congress of Berlin," "The Meeting of Bismarck and Napoleon," and "Moltke at Versailles" among them (1843-1915).

WERNER, FRIEDRICH LUDWIG ZACHARIAS, a poet and dramatist of a mystic stamp, born in K nigsberg; is the subject of an essay by Carlyle, and described by him as a man of a very diabolical spiritual texture; wrote the "Templars of Cyprus," the "Story of the Fallen Master," &c. (1768-1823).

WERTHER, the hero of Goethe's sentimental romance, "The Sorrows of Werther" (q.v.).

WESLEY, CHARLES, hymn-writer, born in Epworth, educated at Eton and Oxford; was associated with his more illustrious brother in the establishment of Methodism; his hymns are highly devotional, and are to be found in all the hymnologies of the Church (1707-1788).

WESLEY, JOHN, the founder of Methodism, born in Epworth, in Lincolnshire, son of the rector, was educated at the Charterhouse and at Lincoln College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow; while there he and his brother Charles, with others, were distinguished for their religious earnestness, and were nicknamed Methodists; in 1736 he went on a mission to Georgia, U.S., and had for fellow-voyagers some members of the Moravian body, whose simple piety made a deep impression on him; on his return two years after he made acquaintance with a Moravian missionary in London, and was persuaded to a kindred faith; up to this time he had been a High Churchman, but thenceforth he ceased from all sacerdotalism and became a believer in and a preacher of the immediate connection of the soul with, and its direct dependence upon, God's grace in Christ alone; this gospel accordingly he went forth and preached in disregard of all mere ecclesiastical authority, riding about from place to place on horseback, and finding wherever he went the people in thousands, in the open air generally, eagerly expectant of his approach, all open-earred to listen to his word; to the working-classes his visits were specially welcome, and it was among them that they bore most fruit; "the keynote of his ministry he himself gave utterance to when he exclaimed, 'Church or no Church, the people must be saved.'" (1703-1791). See also WHITEFIELD.

WESLEYAN METHODISTS, one of the largest dissenting religious bodies in the world, founded on the death of John Wesley in 1791, and originally consisting of 100 preachers. Rapid progress was made by the new church; a missionary branch was formed in 1817, and several training colleges for ministers were opened. The church is governed by a central conference of ministers and laymen, while churches are grouped into circuits; ministers spend only three years in one circuit. Doctrinally, Wesleyans are evangelical in outlook; they have infant baptism.

WESSEL, JOHANN, a Reformer before the Reformation, born in Groningen; was a man of powerful intellect; taught in the schools, and was called by his disciples Lux Mundi (1420-1489).

WHITSTABLE, town in Kent on the coast, 6 m. N. of Canterbury; with Tankerton it forms a watering-place, but is chiefly famous for its oysters.

WHITSUNDAY, the seventh Sunday after Easter, a festival day of the Church kept in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Ghost.

WHITTIER, JOHN GREENLEAF, the American "Quaker Poet," born in Haverhill, in Massachusetts, the son of a poor farmer; wrought, like Burns, at field work, and acquired a loving sympathy with Nature, natural people, and natural scenes; took to journalism at length, and became a keen abolitionist and the poet-laureate of abolition; of his poems "Maiden" and "Skipper Ireson's Ride" are well known (1807-1892).

WHITTINGTON, SIR RICHARD, Lord Mayor of London, born in Pauntley, Gloucestershire, came to London, prospered in business, was elected Lord Mayor three over, and knighted; this is the Whittington of the nursery tale, "Dick Whittington and his Cat" (1338-1433).

WHITWORTH, SIR JOSEPH, eminent mechanician, born in Stockport; the rival of Lord Armstrong in the invention of ordnance, until the amalgamation of their two businesses; invented artillery of great range and accuracy; was made a baronet in 1869 (1803-1887).

WHYTE-MELVILLE, GEORGE JOHN, novelist of the sporting-field, born at Mount Melville, near St. Andrews; entered the army, and for a time served in it; wrote "Digby Grand," "General Hounce," and "The Gladiators"; met his death while hunting (1821-1878).

WICK, county town of Caithness, on Wick River, 161 m. N.E. of Inverness, is the chief seat of the herring fishery in Scotland; Wick proper, with its suburbs Lounsbrough and Bothaven, is on the N. of the river, and Pulteneytown on the S.; has a few manufactures, with distilleries and breweries.

WICKED BIBLE, an edition of the Bible with the word not omitted from the Seventh Commandment, for leaving which in 1632 the printers were fined and the impression destroyed.

WICKLIFFE, JOHN, or WYCLIF, the "Morning Star of the Reformation," born in Hipswell, near Richmond, Yorkshire; studied at Oxford, and became Master of Balliol in 1361, professor of Divinity in 1372, and rector of Lutterworth in 1375; here he laboured and preached with such faithfulness that the Church grew alarmed, and persecution set in, which happily, however, proved scatheless; and only the more emboldened him in the work of reform which he had taken up; of that work the greatest was his translation of the Bible from the Vulgate into the mother-tongue, at which, with assistance from his disciples, he laboured for some 10 or 15 years, and which was finished in 1380; he may be said to have died in harness, for he was struck with paralysis while standing before the altar at Lutterworth on December 29, 1384, and died the last day of the year; his remains were exhumed and burned afterwards, and the ashes thrown into the river Swift close by the town, "and thence borne," says Andrew Fuller, "into the main ocean, the emblem of his doctrine, which now is dispersed all the world over" (1320-1384).

WICKLOW, a maritime county, with a capital of the same name in Leinster, Ireland; is in great part mountainous and barren, has mines and quarries, and some fertile parts.

WIDIN, a town on the right bank of the Danube, Bulgaria, is a centre of industry and trade; was a strong place, but by decree of the Berlin Congress in 1879 the fortress was demolished.

WIDNES, town in Lancashire on the Mersey; besides having other manufactures, the town is the chief centre in England of the chemical industry.

WIELAND, CHRISTOPH MARTIN, eminent German litterateur, born near Biberach, a small village in Württemberg, son of a pastor of the pietist school; studied at Tübingen; became professor of Philosophy at Erfurt, and settled in Weimar in 1772 as tutor to the two sons of the Duchess Anna, where he by-and-by formed a friendship with Goethe and the other members of the literary coterie who afterwards settled there; he wrote in an easy and graceful style, and his best work is a heroic poem entitled "Oberon," based on the French romance of Huon of Bordeaux (1733-1813).

WIELICZKA, a town in Poland, near Cracow, famous for its salt mines, which have been wrought continuously since 1250, the galleries of which extend to more than 50 m. in length, and the annual output of which is over 50,000 tons.

WIER, JOHANN, physician, born in North Brabant; was distinguished as the first to attack the belief in witchcraft, and the barbarous treatment to which suspects were subjected; the attack was treated as profane, and provoked the hostility of the clergy, and it would have cost him his life if he had not been protected by Wilhelm IV., Duke of Juliers and Cleves, whose physician he was (1516-1586).

WIERTZ, ANTOINETTE, a Belgian painter, born in Dinant; did a great number of pictures on a variety of subjects, some of them on a large scale, and all in evidence of a high ideal of his profession, although mainly grotesque and fantastic in conception; was an original genius (1806-1865).

WIESBADEN, capital of Hesse-Nassau, a famous German watering-place, abounding in hot springs, 5 m. NW. of Mainz; has a number of fine buildings and fine parade grounds, picture-gallery, museum, and large library; is one of the best-frequented spas in Europe; it was famed for its springs among the old Romans. In 1925 it became the headquarters of the British Army of Occupation on the withdrawal from Cologne, and was evacuated in December, 1929.

WIFE OF BATH, one of the pilgrims in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales."

WIGAN, a town in Lancashire, 18 m. NW. of Manchester, in the centre of a large coalfield; cottons are the staple manufactures; is a place of ancient date, and has some fine buildings.

WIGHT, ISLE OF, an island in the S. of England, included in Hampshire, from which it is separated by the channel of the Solent (q.v.); it is of triangular shape, is 23 m. of utmost length, and about 14 m. of utmost breadth; is traversed by a range of chalk downs from E. to W.; the soil is fertile, especially in the E.; the scenery rich and varied, and the climate charming; Newport is the capital in the centre; near Cowes is Osborne House, the summer residence of Queen Victoria, and now used as a naval training college, while at Freshwater is the home of the late Lord Tennyson, was named Vectis by the Romans, of whom there are remains in the land.

WIGTOWNSHIRE, the most southerly county in Scotland, in the SW. of which the largest town is Stranraer, and the county town Wigtown; it is an agricultural county, and largely pastoral.

WILBERFORCE, SAMUEL, English prelate, born in Clapham, third son of the succeeding; entered Oriel College, Oxford, at 18, where he distinguished himself by his powers of debate, took holy orders, and rose to eminence in the Church; was made Bishop of Oxford in 1845, and of Winchester in 1869; was a High Churchman of the pure Anglican type, and equally opposed to Romanism and Non-conformity; shone in society by his wit and powers of conversation; was killed by a fall from his horse; he was popularly known by the sobriquet of "Sowby Sam" (1805-1873).

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM, eminent philanthropist, born in Hull, son of a wealthy merchant; attended St. John's College, Cambridge, at 17; represented his native town in Parliament as soon as he was of age; he was early and deeply impressed with the inhumanity of the slave-trade, and to achieve its abolition became the ruling passion of his life; with that object he introduced a bill for its suppression in 1789, but it was not till 1801 he carried the Commons with him, and he had to wait six years longer before the House of Lords supported his measure and the Emancipation Act was passed; he retired into private life in 1825, and died three days after the vote of 20 millions to purchase the freedom of the West Indian slaves; he was an eminently religious man of the Evangelical school; wrote "Practical View of Christianity" (1789-1838).

WILCOX, ELLA WEBSTER, American poetess. She wrote considerable sentimental verse, and for some years had a wide vogue; "Laugh, and the world laughs with you" is perhaps her best-known poem (1855-1919).

WILD, JONATHAN, a notable character in the "Newgate Calendar," a receiver of stolen goods, who for housebreaking was executed in 1725; was the hero of Fielding's novel of the name; he had been a detective earlier in his career; was banished amid execration on the part of the mob at his execution.

WILDE, OSCAR FINIGALL O'FLAHERTIE WILIA, Irish writer. Born in Dublin, he went to Oxford, where he was the Newdigate Prize, and afterwards took the literary world by storm; he was, however, of degenerate morals, and in 1895 was sent to prison for two years for a grave offence; he died in Paris in poverty three years after his release. As a dramatist his work was distinguished chiefly for brilliant epigrams, his plays including "The Importance of Being Earnest" and "Lady Windermere's Fan"; his poems include "The Ballad of Reading Gaol," and he also wrote a novel, "The Picture of Dorian Gray" (1856-1900).

WILDERNESS, a district covered with brushwood in Virginia, U.S., the scene of a two days' terrible conflict in the American Civil War between the Federals and the Confederates on May 5 and 6, 1864.

WILDFIRE, MADGE, a character in the "Heart of Midlothian," who, being seduced, had, in her misery under a sense of her crime, gone crazy.

WILFRID, ST., a Saxon bishop of York, born in Northumbria; brought up at Lindisfarne; had a checkered life; is celebrated in legend for his success in converting pagans, and is usually represented in the act, d. 709.

WILHELMINA I., queen of the Netherlands, daughter of William III., who ascended the throne on his decease in November, 1890; her mother, a sister of the Duchess of Albany, acted as regent during her minority, and she became of age on August 11, 1898, when she was installed as sovereign amid the enthusiasm of her people; in 1901 she married Prince Henry of the Netherlands (1880-).

WILHELMSHAVEN, the chief naval port of Germany, on Jade Haul, 43 m. NW. of Bremen.

WILKES, CHARLES, American naval officer; made explorations in the Southern Ocean in 1838-1842; boarded on the high seas the British mail-steamer Trent in 1861, and carried off two Confederate commissioners accredited to France, who were afterwards released on the demand of the British Government (1798-1877).

WILKES, JOHN, a notable figure in the English political world of the 18th century, born in Dorchester, son of a distiller; was elected M.P. for Aylesbury in 1761; started a periodical called the North Briton, in No. 45 of which he published an offensive libel, which led to his arrest and imprisonment in the Tower, from which he was released on the ground that the general warrant on which he was apprehended was illegal amid general rejoicing among the people; he was afterwards prosecuted for an obscene production, an "Essay on Woman," and outlawed for non-appearance; he sought an asylum in France, and on his return was elected for Middlesex, but instead of being allowed to sit was committed to prison; this treatment made him the object of popular favour; he was elected Lord Mayor of London, re-elected for Middlesex, and at length allowed to take his seat in the House; he was for years the cause of popular tumults, the watchword of which was "Wilkes and Liberty"; the cause of civil liberty certainly owes something to him and to the popular agitation which an interest in him stirred up (1727-1797).

WILKIE, SIR DAVID, painter, born in Cults, Fife; executed a great many pictures depicting homely subjects, which were very popular, and are generally well known by the sagacity of them, such as "The Rent Day," "The Penny Wedding," "Reading the Will," and "The Blind Fiddler," which were followed by others in a more ambitious style, and less appreciated, as well as portraits (1785-1841).

WILKIE, SIR GEORGE HUBERT, Australian explorer. Born at Mount Bryan, south Australia, he became a photographer with the Turkish army in the Balkan War of 1912, and in the Great War served in the Australian Air Force, after being second-in-command of Stefansson's Canadian Arctic expedition of 1913; he took a leading part in the British Imperial Antarctic expedition of 1920, and Shackleton's last expedition of 1921, and in 1926 led the Detroit Arctic expedition (1858-).

WILKINS, JOHN, bishop of Chester, born in Northamptonshire; married Oliver Cromwell's sister; wrote mathematical treatises, a curious one in particular, "Discovery of a New World," and was one of the founders of the Royal Society (1614-1672).

WILKINSON, SIR JOHN GARDNER, Egyptologist, born in Westmorland; studied at Oxford; explored the antiquities of Egypt, and wrote largely on the subject (1797-1875).

WILL, a legal document making provision for the disposal of property after death; only people of full age can make a will, and it must be signed by two witnesses; copies of wills are kept at Hmncet House, London.

WILLEMS, JAN FRANS, Dutch poet and scholar, born near Antwerp; translated "Reynard the

For" into Flemish, and did much to encourage the Flemings to preserve and cultivate their mother-tongue (1798-1816).

WILLETT, WILLIAM, the promoter of the policy of daylight saving, by putting forward clocks one hour in summer; his measure was adopted a year after his death; he was a builder by trade (1857-1915).

WILLIAM I., THE CONQUEROR, king of England, born in Falaise, became Duke of Normandy by the death of his father, being an illegitimate son had to establish his power with the sword, being the cousin of Edward the Confessor was nominated by him his successor to the English throne; on this being usurped by Harold, he invaded England and defeated Harold at Bosham in 1066 and assumed the royal power, which he established over the length and breadth of the country in 1068; he rewarded his followers with grants of land and lordships over them, subject to the Crown, the Domesday Book (q.v.) was compiled by his order, and the kingdom brought into closer relation with the Church of Rome, his adviser in Church matters being Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury (q.v.); died by a fall from his horse when suppressing rebellion in Normandy, and was buried at Caen. His invasion of England is known as the Norman Conquest, and it involved the introduction of the feudal system and Norman manners in the habits and speech of the English people (1027-1087).

WILLIAM II., king of England, surnamed Rufus or Reddy, born in Normandy, third son of William I.; succeeded his father in 1087, had to face a rebellion, headed by Bishop Odo, in favour of his eldest brother, Robert, Duke of Normandy, which he suppressed by favour of the mass of the people, to whom he made promises which he did not keep, for he proved a stern and exacting ruler; his energy was great, but was frequently spasmodic; he added Normandy to his dominion by compact with Robert, who went on Crusade, compelled Malcolm of Scotland to do homage for his kingdom, conducted several campaigns against the Welsh, and had a long-continued wrangle with Archbishop Anselm, virtually in defence of the royal prerogative against the claims of the Church; he was accidentally shot while hunting in the New Forest, and buried in Winchester Cathedral, but without any religious service; in his reign the Crusades began, and Westminster Hall was built (1060-1100).

WILLIAM III., king of England, born in The Hague, son of William II., Prince of Orange, by Mary, the daughter of Charles I.; during a contest on the part of the United Provinces with Louis XIV. was, in 1672, elected Stadtholder, and by his valour and wisdom brought the war to an end in 1678; married his cousin Mary, daughter of James II.; being invited to England, landed with a large army at Torbay, and on the flight of James to France, he and Mary were proclaimed King and Queen of Great Britain and Ireland in 1689; the Scots and the Irish offered resistance in the interest of the exiled monarch, but the former were defeated at Killbuckin in 1690, and the latter at the battle of the Boyne in 1690; he was an able man and ruler, but his reign was troubled by an interminable feud with France, and by intrigues on behalf of James both at home and abroad; he died by a fall from his horse at Kensington just as a great war with France was impending; he was through life the adversary of the covetous schemes of Louis, and before his death he had prepared the materials of that coalition which, under Marlborough and Prince Eugene, brought Louis to the brink of ruin; his reign forms one of the great epochs in the history of England, and his accession is known as the Revolution (1650-1702).

WILLIAM IV., king of England, known as the "sailor king," born in Windsor, the third son of George III.; entered the navy in 1779, saw service under Rodney and Nelson, but practically retired in 1789, as from insubordination he had to do, though he was afterwards promoted to be Admiral of the Fleet, and even Lord High Admiral, and continued to take great interest in naval affairs; after living, as Duke of Clarence, from 1792 to 1816 with Mrs. Jordan, the actress, by whom he had 10 children, he married in 1818 Adelaide, eldest daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen; on the death of the Duke of York in 1827 became heir-presumptive, and on the death of George IV. in 1830 succeeded to the throne; his reign was distinguished by the passing of the first Reform Bill in 1832, the abolition of slavery in the colonies in 1833, the reform of the poor-laws in 1834, and the Municipal Reform Act in 1835; died at Windsor, and was succeeded by his niece, Queen Victoria (1765-1837).

WILLIAM I., German emperor, born in Berlin, second son of Frederick William III. of Prussia, and brother of Frederick William IV., his predecessor on the Prussian throne; was bred from boyhood to military life, having received his first commission at the age of 10; took part in the war of liberation that preceded the fall of Napoleon, and received his baptism of fire on February 14, 1814; visited England in 1844, and again in 1848, and returned prepossessed in favour of constitutional government, which he found the king had already conceded in his absence; in 1858 he was appointed regent owing to his brother's incapacity, and on February 2, 1861, he succeeded to the throne, having previously made the acquaintance of Bismarck in 1814 and of Bismarck in 1834; on his accession, while professing all due respect to the representatives of the people, he announced his intention to maintain to the utmost all his rights as king, and this gave rise to a threat of insurrection, but a war with Denmark, which issued in the recovery of the German duchies of Schleswig-Holstein, led to an outburst of loyalty, and this was deepened by the publication of the project of Bismarck to unite all Germany under the crown of Prussia; this provoked a war with Austria, which lasted only seven weeks, and ended with the consent of the latter to the projected unification of the other States, and the establishment of a confederation of these under the headship of the Prussian king, a unification which was consolidated into an imperial one at the close of the Franco-German War, when, on January 18, 1871, the Prussian king was proclaimed emperor of Germany in the palace of Versailles; the reign which followed was a peaceful one, and the pledge of peace to the rest of Europe; the emperor was a man of robust frame, of imposing figure, of temperate habits, of firm purpose, conspicuous courage, and devoted with his whole heart to the welfare of his people (1797-1888).

WILLIAM II., German emperor, born in Berlin, son of Frederick III., whom he succeeded as emperor in 1888, and grandson of the preceding, and through his mother of Queen Victoria; was trained from early boyhood for kingship, and on his accession to the throne gave evidence of the schooling he had received to equip him for the high post he was called to fill; one of the first acts of his reign was to take upon himself the full responsibility for the home and foreign policy of the State, Bismarck being dismissed by him. Assuming the character of a friend of peace, he continued the preparations for a great war which was to end in the triumph of Germany and make him the ruler of the world; by secret preparation and what he called peaceful penetration, and by unremitting interference in the affairs of other nations, encouraging disputes and discontents and stimulating disloyalty, he did his utmost to make peace impossible; and, finally, on August 1, 1914, he began the Great War which ended in the wreck of his country and his own ruin; abdicated November 9, 1918, and escaped into Holland, where he remained in exile. There was talk of bringing him for trial before an international court, but nothing came of it. It was his habit to wear a strong man, but, although there is no doubt he could have prevented the war had he desired peace, he was as putty in the hands of his advisers; once the war had started he was, despite his pose as "War Lord," little more than a figure-head. His incurable vanity was shown in the pathetic attempt to play the rôle of king in exile at Doorn after 1918. History will take the charitable view that his mind was diseased. (1859-).

WILLIAM, ex-Crown Prince of Germany; he took an important army post on the Western Front in the Great War, was prominent though not successful at the siege of Verdun, and in November, 1918, fled to Holland; later he returned to Germany, but made no real bid for the throne (1882-).

WILLIAM THE LION, king of Scotland, grandson of David I., and brother of Malcolm IV., whom he succeeded in 1165, and whose surname is supposed to have been derived from his substitution of the lion for the dragon on the arms of Scotland; was taken captive when invading England at Alnwick Castle in 1174; sent prisoner to Falaise, in Normandy, but liberated on acknowledgment of vassalage to the English king, a claim which Richard I. surrendered on payment by the Scots of 10,000 marks to aid him in the Crusade; was the first king of Scotland to form an alliance with France; died at Stirling after a reign of 49 years (1143-1214).

WILLIAM THE SILENT, Prince of Orange, a cadet of the noble house of Nassau, the first Stadtholder of the Netherlands, a Protestant by birth; he was brought up a Catholic, but being at heart more a patriot than a Catholic, he took up arms in the cause of his country's freedom, and did not rest till he had virtually freed it from the Spanish yoke, which was then the dominant Catholic power; his enemies procured his assassination in the end, and he was murdered by Balthazar Gerard at Delft; he was brought up at the court of Charles V., where "his circumspect demeanour procured him the surname of Silent, but under the cold exterior he concealed a buoy, far-sighted intellect, and a generous, upright, daring heart" (1533-1584).

WILLIAMS, SIR GEORGE, founder of the Y.M.C.A., born in Duivertown, Somerset, was in business in London sixty years; originated the Association in 1844 and made that and the Band of Hope his philanthropic life-work; was knighted in 1894 (1821-1905).

WILLIAMS, ISAAC, Tractarian, born in Wales; educated at Oxford; got acquainted with Keble, wrote religious poetry and Tract LXXX. on "Reserve in Religious Teaching" (1802-1865).

WILLIAMS, JOHN, missionary and martyr, born near London; brought up an ironmonger; offered his services to the London Missionary Society; was sent out in 1816 to the Society Islands, laboured with conspicuous success among the natives, came home in 1834, and after four years returned, but was murdered at Erromanga in the New Hebrides, and his body eaten by the cannibals (1796-1839).

WILLIAMS, ROGER, founder of the State of Rhode Island, U.S., born in Wales; being a Puritan, fled the country to escape persecution, and settled in New England, where he hoped to enjoy the religious freedom he was denied at home, but was received with disfavour by the earlier settlers as, from his extreme views, a "troubler of Israel," and obliged to separate himself and establish a colony of his own, which he did at Providence by favour of an Indian tribe with whom he had made friends; and under a charter from the Long Parliament of England, obtained through Sir Henry Vane, and thus enjoyed the toleration which he had extended to others; he was characterised by Milton, who knew him, as "that noble champion of religious liberty" (1600-1683).

WILLIAMS, ROWLAND, English clergyman, born in Flintshire; was a prominent member of the Broad Church party; was condemned, though the judgment reversed, by the Court of Arches, for a paper contributed to the famous "Essays and Reviews"; wrote "Rational Godliness," "Christianity and Hinduism," etc. (1817-1870).

WILLIAMS, VAUGHAN, British composer. Born in Down Ampney, Gloucestershire, he studied privately at first and then at the Royal College of Music. A symphony called "London," an opera, "Hugh the Drover," several songs, including the cycle "On Wenlock Edge," and a number of hymn tunes are among his compositions (1872-).

WILLIBROD, ST., the "Apostle of the Frisians," born in Northumbria; was the chief of a company of 12 monks who went as missionaries from Ireland to Frisland, where they were welcomed by Pepin d'Héristal, and afterwards favoured by his son, Charles Martel; he founded an abbey near Trèves;

when he was about to baptize the Duke of Frisland, it is said the duke turned away when he was told his ancestors were in hell, saying he would rather be with them there than in heaven without them (658-739).

WILLINGDON, VISCOUNT, Governor-General of Canada since 1924, as Freeman Freeman-Thomas represented Jamaica in Parliament, 1900-1906; Governor of Bombay, 1913-1919, Governor of Madras, 1919-1924 (1866-).

WILLIS, NATHANIEL PARKER, American author and poet, had travelled much abroad, and published his experiences; among his writings are "Famillings by the Way," "Inklings of Adventure," "People I have Met," and "Melaine and other Poems" (1806-1867).

WILLIS, THOMAS, British doctor. After taking his degree in Oxford he practised for some years in that city, and for the last years of his life was established in London; he published a number of medical works, dealing especially with diabetes and the nervous system (1621-1675).

WILLOUGHBY, SIR HUGH, early Arctic voyager; was sent out in 1553 with three vessels by a company of London merchants on a voyage of discovery, but the vessels were separated by a storm in the North Seas, and not one of them returned; only Richard Chancellor, the captain of one of them, found his way to Moscow, and opened up a trade with Russia and this country; the ships, with the dead bodies of their crews, and the journal of their commander, were found by some fishermen the year after on the coast of Lapland, d. 1554.

WILLS, WILLIAM JOHN, Australian explorer, born in Totnes, accompanied Robert O'Hara Burke from the extreme S. to the extreme N. of the continent, but died from starvation on the return journey two days before his leader (1834-1861).

WILMINGTON, a large and handsome city and port in Delaware, 25 m. SW. of Philadelphia, with extensive manufactures; also the name of the largest city in North Carolina, with considerable manufactures and trade; was a chief Confederate port during the Civil War.

WILSON, ALEXANDER, ornithologist, born in Paisley; son of a weaver, bred to the loom; began his literary career as a poet; imprisoned for a lampoon on a Paisley nobility, went on his release to America unfriended, with only his fowling piece in his hand, and a few shillings in his pocket, led an unsettled life for a time; acquired the arts of drawing, colouring, and etching, and, so accomplished, commenced his studies on the ornithology of America, and prevailed upon a publisher in Philadelphia to undertake an exhaustive work which he engaged to produce on the subject; the first volume appeared in 1808, and the seventh in 1813, on the publication of which he met his death from a cold he caught from swimming a river in pursuit of a certain rare bird (1766-1813).

WILSON, SIR ARTHUR KAVVET, British admiral. Entering the navy at the age of 13, he saw service in the Crimea and China before he was 16, in the Egyptian campaign he won the V.C. at El Tab in 1884, from 1901 to 1907 he was in charge of the Channel fleet, and from 1910 to 1911 was First Sea Lord (1842-1921).

WILSON, CHARLES THOMSON REE, British physicist, succeeded Sir James Dewar as Jacksonian professor at Cambridge in 1925; carried out important researches on electricity and atomic physics; carried out an accurate determination of the ion and electrical charge of an electron; awarded Nobel prize in 1927 (1869-).

WILSON, SIR DANIEL, archaeologist, was born in Edinburgh, became in 1853 professor of English Literature at Toronto; wrote "Memorials of Edinburgh," "Prehistoric Annals of Scotland" and "Prehistoric Man" (1816-1902).

WILSON, SIR ERASMUS, English surgeon, a great authority on skin diseases, and a devoted student of Egyptian antiquities; it was at his instance that the famous Cleopatra's Needle was brought to England; he was liberal in endowments for the advance of medical science (1806-1884).

WILSON, GEORGE, chemist, born in Edinburgh, younger brother of Sir Daniel; was appointed pro-essor of Technology in Edinburgh University; was eminent as a popular lecturer on science, and an enthusiast in whatever subject he took up (1819-1859).

WILSON, SIR HENRY HUGHES, British general. He entered the army in 1884, saw service in Burma and the Boer War, and in 1914 became assistant chief-of-staff to French; he was in Russia in 1916, and the following year became our military representative on the Versailles War Council; early in 1918 he became Chief of the Imperial General Staff; knighted in 1916, he was made a field-marshal in 1919, a keen opponent of Sinn Féin in Ireland, he was shot dead outside his London home by Irish fanatics, and was buried in St. Paul's (1864-1922).

WILSON, HORACE HAYMAN, Orientalist, born in London; studied medicine; went to India as a surgeon; mastered Sanskrit, and became Boden professor at Oxford (1786-1860).

WILSON, JOHN, Indian missionary, born near Lauder, educated at Edinburgh; missionary at Bombay from 1828 to his death—in 1843 in connection with the Free Church of Scotland; from his knowledge of the languages and religions of India, and his sagacity was held in high regard (1804-1875).

WILSON, JOHN, the well-known "Christopher North," born in Paisley, son of a manufacturer, who left him a fortune of £60,000; studied at Glasgow and Oxford; a man of powerful physique, and distinguished as an athlete as well as a poet; took up his abode in the Lake District, and enjoyed the society of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey; wrote two poems, the "Isle of Palms," and the "City of the Plague"; lost his fortune, and came to settle in Edinburgh; was called to the Scottish bar, but never practised; became editor of Blackwood's Magazine, and was in 1820 elected over Sir William Hamilton professor of Moral Philosophy in Edinburgh University; his health began to fail in 1840; resigned his professorship in 1851, and received a pension from the Crown of £300; his "Noctes Ambrosianae," in 4 vols., are characteristic of his abundant humour and judicious criticism (1795-1854).

WILSON, WOODROW, American politician. A professor by occupation, he first came into prominence politically in 1912 as governor of New Jersey, and the following year was elected President of the United States. Early in the Great War he brought pressure to bear on Germany in an effort to make her abandon attacks on non-combatants, and, these failing, he was largely responsible for his country's entry into the war in 1917. He came to Europe for the Peace Conference, where his most notable work was the inclusion in the Treaty of Versailles of the League of Nations Covenant; but he was acting without the authority of his legislature, and on his return American participation in the League was rejected. Wilson retired from office in 1921, and died three years later. A man of high ideals, it was he who coined the phrase "make the world safe for democracy." It was during his term of office that Prohibition became the law of the U.S.A. (1856-1924).

WILTON, market town in Wiltshire, 3 m. NW. of Salisbury; was the ancient capital of Wessex, and gave name to the county; its church, erected by Lord Herbert of Lea in 1444, is a rich Lombardic structure, with a campanile 108 ft. high.

WISDOM OF JESUS. See ECCLÉSIASTICUS.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON, one of the most beautiful books in the Apocrypha, written at the close of the 2nd century B.C. by one who knew both the Greek language and Greek philosophy, to commend the superiority to this philosophy of the divine wisdom revealed to the Jews. Its general aim, as has been said, is "to show, alike from philosophy and history, as against the materialists of the time, that the proper goal of life was not mere existence, however long, or pleasure of any sort, but something nobly intellectual and moral, and that the pious Israelite was on the surest path to its attainment."

WISEMAN, NICHOLAS PATRICK STEPHEN, cardinal and Roman Catholic archbishop of Westminster, born in Seville, of Irish parents; studied at the English college at Rome, of which he became rector; lectured in London in 1836 on the Doctrines of the Catholic Church, and in 1840 became vicar-apostolic, first in the central district of England, then of the London district in 1846, and was in 1850 named archbishop of Westminster by the Pope; this was known in England as the "papal aggression," which raised a storm of opposition in the country, but this storm Wiseman, now cardinal, succeeded very considerably in allaying by a native courtesy of manner which commended him to the regard of the intelligent and educated classes of the community; he was a scholarly man, and a vigorous writer and orator (1802-1866).

WISHART, GEORGE, a Scottish martyr, born in Forfarshire; began life as a schoolmaster; was charged with heresy for teaching the Greek New Testament; left the country and spent some time on the Continent; on his return boldly preached and preached the Reformation doctrine, and had the celebrated John Knox, who was tutor in the district, for a disciple among others, he was arrested in Haddingtonshire in January and burned at St. Andrews in March, 1546; Knox would fain have accompanied him on his arrest, but was paternally dissuaded by the gentle martyr; "Go home to your bairns" (pupils), said he; "and is sufficient for a sacrifice" (c. 1513-1546).

WISMAR, a seaport of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on the Baltic; has a number of quaint old buildings, various manufactures, and an active trade.

WOTTON, SIR HENRY, diplomatist and scholar, born in Kent; was ambassador of James I. for 20 years, chiefly at Venice; visited Kepler (q.v.) on one occasion, and found him a very "ingenious person," and came under temporary eclipse for his definition of an ambassador, "An honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country"; was ultimately provost of Eton, and was a friend of many good men, among others Isaac Walton, who wrote his life; he wished to be remembered as the author of the saying, "The itch of controversy is the scab (scabies) of the Churches," and caused it to be inscribed in his epitaph (1608-1639).

WOUEVERMANS, PHILIP, Dutch painter, born in Haarlem, where he lived and died; painted small landscapes, hunting pieces, and battle pieces, from which the picture-dealers profited, while he lived and died poor; had two brothers, whose pictures are, though inferior, often mistaken for his (1619-1668).

WRANGLER, FREDERICK, COUNT VON, Prussian field-marshal, born in Stettin, served with distinction in various campaigns, and commanded in the Danish War of 1864, and was present in the Austro-Prussian War of 1866 though without command; was known as "Papa Wrangel" among the Berliners, who loved him for his disregard of grammar (1784-1877).

WRANGLER, BARON PETER, Russian general. Born in St. Petersburg, he entered the army, fought in the Russo-Japanese War and held a command in the Great War; but it was not until after the 1917 revolution that he became prominent, leading the anti-Bolshevik forces, or White Russians, and being defeated by the Bolsheviks in 1920 (1879-1928).

WRANGLER, name given in Cambridge University to those placed in the first class of Part II. of the Mathematical Tripos; the man heading the list was formerly known as the Senior Wrangler, but the names are no longer placed in order of merit.

WREDE, KARL PHILIPP, PRINCE, field-marshal, born in Kiedelberg; served as a Bavarian general against Austria as the ally of Napoleon at Wagram, and also in the expedition against Russia in 1812, on which occasion he covered the retreat of the French army, to the loss of nearly all the cavalry; fought against the French at Hanau; was defeated, but was afterwards successful on French soil, and eventually became commander-in-chief of the Bavarian army (1767-1858).

WREN, SIR CHRISTOPHER, architect, born in East Knoyle, in Wiltshire; educated at Westminster School and Wadham College, Oxford, and became Fellow of All Souls; was early distinguished in mathematics and for mechanical ingenuity, and soon became notable for his skill in architecture, and received a commission to restore St. Paul's, London, but on its destruction in 1666 he was appointed to design and erect an entirely new structure; for this he had prepared himself by study abroad, and he proceeded to construct a new St. Paul's after the model of St. Peter's at Rome, a work which, as it occupied him from 1675 to 1710, took him 35 years to finish; he died at the age of 90, sitting in his chair after dinner, and was buried in the cathedral which he had erected, with this inscription, "Si monumentum requiris, circumspice" (If you seek his monument, look around); many famous London churches, including St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and St. Bride's, Fleet Street, were designed by him, together with Chelsea Hospital, Marlborough House, and part of Windsor Castle; Wren was a man of science as well as an artist; he was at one time Savilian professor of Mathematics at Oxford, and one of the founders of the Royal Society (1632-1723).

WREN, MATTHEW, bishop of Ely; was one of the judges of the Star Chamber; assisted in preparing the liturgy for Scotland, which, when read in St. Giles', Edinburgh, roused the ire of Jenny Geddes (q.v.); was impeached, and confined in the Tower for 18 years, and released at the Restoration (1585-1667).

WREXHAM, an important town in Denbighshire, North Wales, 12 m. SW. from Chester, in the centre of a mining district, and famed for its breweries.

WRIGHT, JOSEPH, painter, usually called "Wright of Derby" from his birthplace and place of residence nearly all his life; he excelled in portraits, and in the representation of the effects especially of firelight (1734-1797).

WRIGHT, ORVILLE, American aeronaut. With his brother Wilbur (q.v.) he began experiments with a glider in Carolina in 1900, and in 1903 built a machine fitted with a petrol engine; on December 17 that year they flew for 300 yards, the first successful flight ever made. The Wright brothers were thus the real pioneers of aeroplane aviation (1871-).

WRIGHT, THOMAS, antiquary, born in Shropshire, but settled in London; wrote or edited a vast number of works bearing on the antiquities, literary and other, of England, and was connected with the founding of sundry antiquarian societies (1810-1877).

WRIGHT, WILBUR, American aeronaut, brother of Orville Wright, and with him the pioneer of the aeroplane; he died of fever (1867-1912).

WRITERS TO THE SIGNET, a body of solicitors in Scotland who had at one time the exclusive privilege of practising in and drawing up cases for the supreme courts of the country, and whose privileges are now limited to the preparation of Crown writs.

WROTTESELEY, LORD, British astronomer, erected an observatory at Blackheath; president of the British Association at Oxford in 1860 (1824-1910).

WULFSTAN, ST., Saxon bishop of Worcester in the days of Edward the Confessor; being falsely accused by his adversaries, after the king's death, he was required to resign, but refused, and laying his crozier on the Confessor's shrine called upon him to decide who should wear it; none of his accusers could lift it, only himself, to his exculpation from their accusations; archbishop of York from 1003 to his death in 1023.

WUNDT, WILHELM MAX, distinguished German physiologist, born in Baden and professor at Leipzig; eminent for his studies on the connection of the physical with the psychical in the human organisation, and wrote on psychology as well as physiology (1832-1920).

WUPPERTHAL, a densely peopled valley in Germany traversed by the river Wupper, which after a course of 40 m. enters the Rhine between Cologne and Düsseldorf; it embraces the towns of Barmen and Elberfeld.

WURMSER, COUNT VON, Austrian general, born in Alsace; took an active part in the war with France; commanded the respect of Napoleon for his defence of Mantua, on the capitulation of which he refused to take him prisoner (1721-1797).

WURTEMBERG, a former kingdom of South Germany, about one-fourth the size of Scotland, between Baden on the W. and Bavaria on the E.; the Black Forest extends along the W. of it, and it is traversed nearly E. and W. by the Swabian Alp, which slopes down on the N. side into the valley of the Neckar, and on the S. into that of the Danube; the soil is fertile, and is in great part under cultivation, yielding corn, vines, and fruits, agriculture being the chief industry of the population; minerals abound, the chief being salt and iron. Stuttgart is the capital; the towns are the centres of varied manufactures; education is of a high standard; associated with the country are a number of famous names—enough to mention the names of Kepler, Schiller, Hegel, Schelling, and Strauss; the government was formerly constitutional, under a hereditary sovereign, but is now a republic.

WURTZ, CHARLES ADOLF, French chemist, born in Strasbourg; invented a method for the preparation of ethane by the action of sodium on methyl iodide (1817-1844).

WURZBURG, a Bavarian town in a valley of the Main, 70 m. SE. of Frankfurt; its principal buildings are the Royal or Episcopal Palace, the cathedral, and the university, with the Julius Hospital, called after its founder, Bishop Julius, who was also founder of the university, which is attended by over 1000 students, mostly medical, and has a library of 100,000 volumes; the fortress of Marienberg, overlooking the town, was till 1720 the episcopal palace.

WUTKE, KARL, theologian, born in Breslau, professor at Halle; wrote on Christian ethics, stoutly maintained the incompleteness of Christianity with democracy, that a Christian could not be a democrat or a democrat a Christian (1819-1870).

WYANDOTS, a tribe of North American Indians of the Iroquois stock; were nearly exterminated in 1836, but a feeble remnant of them now occupy a small district in the Indian Territory.

WYATT, RICHARD, sculptor, born in London; studied in Rome under Canova, and had Gibson for fellow-student; a man of classical tastes, and produced a number of exquisitely modelled, especially female, figures (1799-1850).

WYATT, SIR THOMAS, English poet, courtier, and statesman, born at Allington Castle, in Kent, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; was a welcome presence at court, a friend of Anne Boleyn, in high favour with the King, and knighted in 1537; did a good deal of diplomatic work in Spain and the Netherlands, and died on his way to meet the Spanish ambassador and convey him to London; he had travelled in Italy, had studied the lyric poets of Italy, especially Petrarch, and, along with Surrey, imported their sentiment into English verse, "amorous poetry," as it has been called, "a poetry extremely personal, and personal as English poetry had scarcely ever been before" (1503-1542).

WYATT, SIR THOMAS, the younger, only son of the preceding; was leader of the rebellion that broke out in 1554 in consequence of the settlement of the marriage between Queen Mary and Philip of Spain, in which, being repulsed at Temple Bar, he surrendered and was committed to the Tower, and for which he was executed, Lady Jane Grey and her husband following to the same doom shortly after (1530-1554).

WYCHERLEY, WILLIAM, dramatist, born in Shropshire, of good birth, and resident for a time in Paris, being admitted to the circle of the Précieuses, but returned to England at the Restoration, and became a figure at the court; his plays were marked with the coarseness of the time, and his best were "The Country Wife" (1675) and "The Plain Dealer" (1677); married the Countess of Drogheda for her fortune, a legacy which cost him only lawsuits and imprisonment for debt; succeeded to his paternal estate when he was an old man; married again, and died immediately after (1640-1718).

WYCLIFFE, JOHN. See WICKLIFFE.

WYCOMBE, HIGH, a market town in Buckinghamshire, on the Wye, 25 m. SE. of Oxford; has a parish church built in the Norman style in 1273 and restored in 1887, and several public buildings; the manufacture of chairs, lace, and straw-plait among the leading industries.

WYE, a lovely winding river in South Wales, which rises near the source of the Severn on Plynlimmon, and falls into its estuary at Chepstow, 125 m. from its head; rapid in its course at first, it becomes gentler as it gathers volume; harges second it as far as Hereford, but a high tidal wave makes navigation dangerous at its mouth.

WYKEHAM, WILLIAM OF, bishop of Winchester, born in Wykeham, Hampshire, of humble parentage; was patronised by the governor of Winchester Castle and introduced by him to Edward III., who employed him to superintend the rebuilding of Windsor Castle, and by-and-by made him Privy Seal and Lord Chancellor, though he fell into disgrace towards the close of Edward's reign; was restored to favour in Richard II.'s reign and once more made Chancellor; in his later years he founded the New College, Oxford, built and endowed St. Mary's College, Winchester, and rebuilt the cathedral there. He was less of a theologian than an architect; was disparagingly spoken of by John Wicliffe as a "builder of castles," and his favourite motto was, "Manners make the man" (1324-1404).

WYNAAID, a highland district in the Western Ghats, Madras Presidency, with extensive coffee plantations, and a wide distribution of auriferous quartz rock, the working of which has involved the loss of much capital.

WYNANTS, JAN, one of the greatest of the Dutch landscape painters; born in Haarlem; had for pupils Philip Wouvermans (q.v.) and Adrian van de Velde (1615-1679).

WYNDHAM, SIR CHARLES, English actor; served in the American Civil War as a surgeon; took to the stage, playing first with John Wilkes Booth; appeared in London in 1865; was successful in the management of the Criterion Theatre where he produced and acted in "Pink Dominoes," "Wild Oats," "David Garrick," "She Stoops to Conquer," and "The School for Scandal," among other plays; built Wyndham's Theatre and was associated many years in management with Mary Moore (1841-1919).

WYNTOUN, ANDREW OF, Scottish chronicler; lived at the end of the 14th and beginning of the 15th centuries; was canon regular of St. Andrews and prior of St. Serf, Lochleven; the subject of his "Original Chronicle," as he calls it, was Scottish history, from the creation downwards, and it was written in verse that can hardly be called poetry; it is of value historically and interesting philologically, and consists of nine books or cantos; it is to him we owe "When Alexander our King was dead."

WYOMING, a north-west State of the U.S.A., chiefly on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, an elevated region about three times the area of Ireland, and with a comparatively sparse population, settled principally along the line of the Union Pacific Railway; it has a very rugged surface, and abounds in deep cañons and frowning precipices, the lakes also are deep, and there are immense caverns, one, the Great Cavern, throwing up a volume of water 300 ft. high; it is rich in minerals, yields good crops of various grains, rears large herds of horses and cattle, as well as game on its mountains, and trout and salmon in its rivers. See YELLOWSTONE PARK.

WYOMING VALLEY, a fertile valley in Pennsylvania, on the Susquehanna River, 20 m. long by 5 broad; it was the scene in 1778 of a series of contests between rival settlers, when the last of them were set upon by an invading force, forced to surrender, and either massacred or driven forth from the valley; Campbell's "Gertrude of Wyoming" relates to this last disaster.

WYSS, JOHANN RUDOLF, Swiss littérateur, born in Berne, professor of Philosophy there; the author of the "Swiss Family Robinson," on which alone his title to fame rests (1781-1830).

WYVERN, a heraldic device in shape of a dragon with expanded wings, with only two legs and the pointed tail of a scorpion.

XANTHAMIDE, a crystalline substance produced by passing ammonia gas through xanthic or ether acid in an alcoholic solution.

XANTHUS, principal city in ancient Lycia, on a river of the same name, celebrated for its temples and works of art; sustained two sieges, the last of which terminated in the self-destruction of its inhabitants; ruins of it exist, and are Cyclopean; also the name of a river in the Troad, called also the Scamander.

XANTIPPE, or XANTHIPPE, the name of the wife of Socrates, a woman of a peevish and shrewish disposition, the subject of exaggerated gossip in Athens, to the exaltation of the temper of her husband, which it never ruffled.

XAVIER, ST. FRANCIS, a Jesuit missionary, styled usually the "Apostle of the Indies," born of a noble family, in the north of Spain; a student of Sainte Barbe in Paris, he took to philosophy, became acquainted with Ignatius Loyola, and was associated with him in the formation of the Jesuit Society; was sent in 1541, under sanction of the Pope, by John III. of Portugal to christianise India and arrived at Goa in 1542, whence he extended his missionary labours to the Eastern Archipelago, to Ceylon and Japan, in which enterprises they were attended with signal success; on his return to Goa in 1552 he proceeded to organise a mission to China, in which he experienced such opposition and so many difficulties that on his way, to carry on his work there he sickened and died; he was buried at Goa; beatified by Paul V. in 1619, and canonised by Gregory XV. in 1622; festival, December 3 (1500-1552).

XEBEC, a small three-masted vessel with lateen and square sails, used formerly in the Mediterranean by the Algerine pirates, and mounted with guns.

XENIEN, the name, derived from Martial, of a series of stinging epigrams issued at one time by Goethe and Schiller, which created a great sensation and gave offence to many, causing "the solemn empire of dulness to quake from end to end."

XENOCRATES, an ancient philosopher and a disciple of Plato, born in Chalcodon, and a successor of Plato in the Academy as head of it; d. 314 B.C.

XENON, one of the inert gases, similar to argon, neon, and helium; discovered by Sir William Ramsay (q.v.).

XENOPEANES, the founder of the Eleatic school of philosophy, born in Asia Minor; was the first to enunciate the doctrine "all is one," but "without specifying," says Schwegler, "whether this unity was intellectual or moral. . . Aristotle says he called God the one."

XENOPHON, historian, philosopher, and military commander, born in Athens, son of an Athenian of good position; was a pupil and friend of Socrates; joined the expedition of Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes, and on the failure of it conducted the ten thousand Greeks—"the Retreat of the Ten Thousand"—who went up with him back to the Bosphorus, served afterwards in several military adventures, brought himself under the ban of his fellow-citizens in Athens, and retired to Elis, where he spent 20 years of his life in the pursuits of country life and in the prosecution of literature; the principal of his literary works, which it appears have all come down to us, are the "Anabasis," being an account in seven books of the expedition of Cyrus and his own conduct of the retreat; the "Memorabilia," in four books, being an account of the life and teaching, and a defence, of his master Socrates; the "Hæcæica," in seven books, being an account of 49 years of Grecian history in continuation of Thucydides to the battle of Mantinea; and "Cyropædia," in eight books, being an ideal account of the education of Cyrus the Elder. Xenophon wrote pure Greek in a plain, unpretentious and unaffected style, had an eye to the practical in his estimate of things, and professed a sincere belief in a divine government of the world (435-354 B.C.).

—, a town in Spain, 14 m. N.E. of Cadix, a well-built, busy town, and the centre of the trade in sherry wine which takes its name from it, and of which there are large stores.

XERXES, a king of Persia, son of Darius I., whom he succeeded on the throne in 485 B.C.; in his ambition to subdue Greece, which, after suppressing a revolt in Egypt, he in 481 essayed to do with an immense horde of men both by sea and land, he with his army crossed the Hellespont by means of a bridge of boats, was checked for a time at Thermopylae by Leonidas and his five hundred, advanced to Athens to see his fleet destroyed at Salamis by Themistocles, fled at the sight by the way he came, and left Mardonius with 300,000 men to carry out his purpose, but, as it happened, to suffer defeat on the fatal field of Plataea in 479, and the utter annihilation of all his hopes; the rest of his life he spent in obscurity, and he was assassinated in 465 B.C. by Artabanus, the captain of his body-guard, after a reign of 20 years.

XESIBELAND, a region in South Africa lying between Griqualand East and Pondoland; was annexed to Cape Province in 1886.

XIMENES DE CISNEROS, FRANCISCO, cardinal and statesman, born in Castile, of a poor but noble family; studied at Salamanca and went to Rome, where he gained favour with the Pope, who appointed him to the first vacant ecclesiastical preferment in Spain, as the result of which he in 1495 became archbishop of Toledo, but not till he was 60 years of age; in 10 years after this he became regent of Spain, and conducted the affairs of the kingdom with consummate ability. He was a severe man, and he was careful to promote what he considered the best and highest interests of the nation; but he was narrow-minded, and did often more harm than good; he was intolerant of heresy such as the Church deemed it to be, and contrived by his policy to confer more than sovereign rights upon the crown. He was to Spain pretty much what Richelieu was to France; d. 1517.

XIMENES, GONZALO DE QUESADA, Spanish statesman; he led an expedition to New Granada in 1538, and succeeded in conquering the country.

ZERO, a word of Arab origin signifying a cipher, and employed to denote a neutral point in scale between an ascending and descending series, or between positive and negative.

ZEUS, the chief deity of the Greeks, the sovereign ruler of the world, the father of gods and men, the mightiest of all the gods, to whose will as central all must bow; he was the son of Kronos and Rhea; by the help of his brothers and sisters dethroned his father, seized the sovereign power, and appointed them certain provinces of the universe to administer in his name—Hera to rule with him as queen above, Poseidon over the sea,

Pluto over the nether world, Demeter over the fruits of the earth, Hestia over social life of mankind; to his dynasty all the powers in heaven and earth were more or less related, descended from it and dependent on it; and he himself was to the Greeks the symbol of the intelligence which was henceforth to be the life and light of men, an idea which is reflected in the name Jupiter given him by the Romans, which means "father of the day"; he is represented as having his throne in heaven, and as wielding a thunderbolt in his right hand, in symbol of the jealousy with which he guards the order of the world established under him as chief.

ZEUSS, JOHANN KASPAR, great Celtic scholar, and the founder of Celtic philology, born in Vogtland, in Upper Franconia, professor at Bamberg; his great work, "Grammatica Celtica" (1806-1856).

ZEUXIS, famous Greek painter, born in Heraclea, who flourished from about 420 B.C. to the close of the century; was unrivalled in rendering types of sensuous, especially female, beauty, and his principal works are his pictures of "Helen," "Zeus Enthroned," "The Infant Hercules Strangling the Serpent"; he is said to have given away several of his works rather than sell them, as no price could pay him for them.

ZIDON, an ancient town of Phœnicia, 20 m. N. of Tyre, and the original capital.

ZIETHEN, JOHANN JOACHIM VON, Prussian general, born in Russia; entered the army at the age of 16, served as a cavalry officer under Frederick the Great, was one of the greatest of his generals, became his personal friend, and contributed to a great many of his victories, all of which he lived through, spending his days thereafter in quiet retirement at Berlin in favour with the people and in honour to the last with the king (1699-1786).

ZIG, a giant cock in the Talmud (q.v.), which stands with its foot on the earth, touches heaven with its head, and when it spreads its wings causes a total eclipse of the sun.

ZILLERTHAL, a valley in the Tyrol, watered by the Ziller, an affluent of the Inn, some 400 of the inhabitants of which were in 1837 obliged to seek a home elsewhere because of their opposition to the practice of auricular confession, eventually settling near Liegnitz, in Silesia.

ZIMBABWE, a remarkable ruin in Mashonaland, the remains apparently of some enterprising colony of nature-worshippers that settled there in ancient times, in the interest of trade presumably.

ZIMMERMANN, JOHAN GEORG, BARON VON, Swiss physician, born in Brugg, in the canton of Berne; studied at Göttingen, became the friend of Haller (q.v.), and settled down to practice in his native town, where he continued 16 years, very successful both in medicine and literature, but "tormented with hypochondria," and wrote his book on "Holltude," which was translated into every European language; wrote also on "Medical Experiences," a famed book in its day too, also on "National Pride," and became "famed throughout the universe"; attended Frederick the Great on his deathbed, and wrote an unwise book about him, "a poor puddle of calumnies and credulities" (1728-1795).

ZINC, a common metal, somewhat like tin, found in the minerals zinc-blende and calamine; it is used for coating or galvanising iron.

ZINDIKITES, a Mohammedan heretical sect, who disbelieve in Allah, and deny the resurrection and a future life.

ZINOVIEFF LETTER, a communication sent in September, 1924, by the Third (Communist) International, of which Zinovieff was the head, to the Russian chargé d'affaires in London with instructions for intensive revolutionary propaganda in England; it was largely the publication of a letter to the eve of the general election of 1924 that led to the defeat of the first Labour Government.

ZINZENDORF, NICOLAUS, COUNT VON, a German count, born in Dresden; studied at Wittenberg, came under the influence of the Pietist Spener, gave himself up to evangelical labours, and established a religious community on his estate at Herrnhut, in Saxony, consisting chiefly of a body of Moravian Brethren, who had been driven out of Bohemia and Moravia on account of their religious opinions, and were called Herrnhuters; he became one of their leaders and chief apostles, labouring far and wide in the propagation of their doctrines and suffering no small persecution by the way; he was an earnest man, the author of religious writings, controversial and devotional; wrote a number of hymns, and died at Herrnhut, from which he was driven forth, but to which he was allowed to return before the end (1700-1760).

ZION, that one of the four hills on which Jerusalem is built, on the SW. of the city, and the site of the palace of King David and his successors.

ZIONISM, the name given to a movement on the part of the Jews to re-establish themselves in Palestine as a nation. It gained impetus after the capture of Palestine from the Turks in 1917.

ZIRCONIA LIGHT, an intensely brilliant light, similar to the Drummond light, but differing from it chiefly in the employment of cones of zirconia instead of cylinders of lime; it has been superseded by the electric light.

ZIRCONIUM, a metallic element often found in connection with silica, commonly in the form of a black powder; zirconia is the oxide.

ZIRENITZ, LAKE, a high-lying lake in Carinthia, 20 m. SW. of Laybach, the waters of which in the dry season will sometimes disappear altogether through the fissures, and in rainy will sometimes expand into a lake 5 m. long and 3 m. broad.

ZISKA, JOHANN, Hussite leader, born in Bohemia of a noble family, began life as a page at the court of King Wenceslas, but threw up a courtier's life in disgust for a career in arms, fought and distinguished himself by his valour against the Teutonic knights at Tannenberg in 1410, to their utter defeat; signalled himself afterwards against the Turks, and in 1419 fought on the English side at Agincourt; failing to rouse Wenceslas to avenge the death of Huss (q.v.) and of Jerome of Prague (q.v.), he joined the Hussites, organised their forces, assumed the chief command, and in 1420 gained, with a force of 4000 men, a victory over the Emperor Sigismund with an army of 40,000 mustered to crush him; captured next year the castle of Prague, erected fortresses over the country, one in particular called Tabor, whence the name Taborites given to his party; blind of one eye from his childhood, lost the other at the siege of Ratz, fought on blind notwithstanding, gaining victory after victory, but was seized with the plague and carried off by it at Zaslav, where his remains were buried and his big nose of battle-club, mostly iron, hung honourably on the wall close by; that his skin was tanned and made into the cover of a drum is a fable; he was a tough soldier, and is called in Carlyle's "Frederick" "Rhinoceros Ziska" (1360-1424).

ZITTAU, a town of Saxony, 71 m. SE. of Dresden, with a magnificent Rathhaus; stands on a vast lignite deposit; manufactures cotton, linen, machinery, &c.

ZLATOUST, a Russian town near the Urals, 180 m. NE. of Ufa, with iron and gold mines near; manufactures sword-blades and other steel ware.

ZOARE, a small village of Ohio, U.S., 91 m. S. of Cleveland, once the seat of a German Socialistic community.

ZODIAC, the name given to a belt of the heavens extending 8° on each side of the ecliptic, composed of twelve constellations, called signs of the zodiac, which the sun traverses in the course of a year. These signs are named: Aries, the Ram; Taurus, the Bull; Gemini, the Twins; Cancer, the Crab; Leo, the Lion; Virgo, the Virgin; Libra, the Balance; Scorpio, the Scorpion; Sagittarius, the Archer; Capricornus, the Goat; Aquarius, the Water-bearer; and Pisces, the Fishes. The sun enters Aries at the spring equinox and Libra at the autumnal equinox, while the first point of Cancer marks the summer solstice, and that of Capricorn the winter. The name Zodiac is derived from the Greek zōon, an animal, and has been given to the belt because the majority of the signs are named after animals.

ZODIACAL LIGHT, a track of light seen at times along the ecliptic; in the tropics it may form a complete ring; it appears to be due to reflection from matter surrounding the sun.

ZOFFANY, JOHANN, German painter. Though of German birth he studied in Rome and did most of his work in England, where he made a considerable reputation as a portrait painter; he was made an R.A. in 1769 (1735-1810).

ZOHAR, a Jewish book of cabalistic commentaries on the Old Testament.

ZOLLUS, a Greek rhetorician who flourished in the 3rd century B.C.; was distinguished for the bitterness with which he criticized Homer, and his name has in consequence become a synonym for a malignant critic, hence the saying, "Every great poet has his Zollus."

ZOLA, EMILE, a noted French novelist of the realistic school, or of what he preferred to call the naturalist school, born in Paris, of Italian descent; began literature as a journalist, especially in the critical department, but soon gave himself up to novel-writing, ultimately on realistic lines, and an undue catering, as some think, to a morbid interest in the seamy side of life, to which he addressed himself with great vigour and graphic power; of his works the chief are "Thérèse Raquin," "La Fortune des Rougons," "L'Assommoir," "Le roman expérimental," and "Paris"; he distinguished himself by his courage in connection with the Dreyfus affair and his bold condemnation of the sentence under which Dreyfus was condemned (1849-1902).

ZOLAISM, name given to an excessive realism in depicting the worst side of human life and society. See ZOLA.

ZOLLNER, JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH, German scientist, who did much work with spectrum analysis and photometry; he went to Basel University, and in 1872 was made a professor at Leipzig (1834-1882).

ZOLLVEREIN (Customs Union), a union of the German States under Prussia in 1827, and extended in 1867, to establish among them a uniform system of customs rates.

ZOMBA, town in Nyasaland, of which it is the capital; it stands on the side of Mount Zomba, 10 m. W. of Lake Shirwa.

ZONE FOSSILS, name given to the family of fossils the members of which are used by geologists to distinguish the different horizons of geological strata, e.g. the different subdivisions of the Jurassic are marked by peculiar species of ammonites.

ZONER, the name given to belts of climate on the surface of the earth marked off by the tropical and polar circles, of which the former are 23½° from the equator and the latter 23½° from the poles, the zone between the tropical circles, subject to extremes of heat, being called the Torrid Zone, the zones between the polar circles and the poles, subject to extremes of cold, being called respectively the North Frigid Zone and the South Frigid Zone, and the zones north and south of the Torrid, subject to moderate temperature, being called respectively the North Temperate and the South Temperate Zones.

ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS, a portion of Regent's Park containing one of the world's best collections of animals, birds, and reptiles; controlled by the Zoological Society, the gardens were opened in 1827; the public are admitted every day except Sunday, which is reserved for Fellows and their guests.

ZOROASTER, ZARATHUSTRA, or ZERDUSHT, the founder or reformer of the Parsee religion, of whom, though certainly a historical personage, nothing whatever is for certain known except that his family name was Spitama, that he was born in Bactria, and that he could not have flourished later than 800 B.C.; he appears to have been a pure monotheist, and not to be responsible for the Manichean doctrine of dualism associated with his name, as Zoroastrianism, or the institution of fire-worship.

ZOSIMUS, Greek historian; wrote a history of the Roman emperors from the time of Augustus to the year 410, and ascribed the decline of the empire to the decay of paganism (408-450).

ZOUAVES, the name given to a body of light infantry in the French army. They were raised in 1830 from among the Zouavay, a tribe of Kabyle Arabs, whose name they spelled in the French way; but since 1840 they have been almost always men of superior physique specially selected from the ordinary infantry regiments of the line.

ZOUTPANSBERG, a ridge of mountains on the N.E. of the Transvaal, being a continuation of the Drakensberg.

ZSCHORKE, JOHANN HEINRICH, a German writer, born in Masdeburg, lived chiefly at Aarau, in Aargau, Switzerland, where he spent forty years of his life, part of them in the service of his adopted country, and where he died; wrote histories and a series of tales, but is best known by his "Stunden der Andacht" (i.e. hours of devotion), on ethical-rationalistic lines (1771-1848).

ZSIGMONDY, RICHARD, German scientist, professor at Göttingen; invented the ultra-microscope; awarded the Nobel Prize for Chemistry in 1925; d. 1929.

ZUG, the smallest canton of Switzerland, which sends only one representative to the National Council; is 12 m. long by 9 m. broad; is hilly and pastoral in the S.E., and has cultivated fields and orchards in the N.W.; all but includes Lake Zug, at the N.E. of which is Zug, the capital, which carries on sundry industries on a small scale.

ZUIDER ZEE (i.e. south sea), a deep inlet of the North Sea, in the Netherlands, which includes the islands of Texel, Vlieland, Terschelling, and Ameland, and was formed by irruptions of the North Sea into a lake called Flevo, in the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries, when thousands of people were drowned; is 85 m. long and 45 m. broad, and is embraced in a circuit of 210 m.; 150,000 acres of land have been reclaimed from it since the 17th century.

ZULEIKA, the bride of Abydos, celebrated by Byron, a pure-souled woman of great beauty, who, in love with Selim, promises to flee with him and become his bride, but her father shoots him and she dies of a broken heart.

ZULULAND, a territory to the N.E. of Natal, from which it is separated by the Tugela, and of which it was independent till 1898, but is now an integral part; it is a little larger than England, is well watered, is capable of cultivation, and has 140 m. of seaboard; it possesses considerable mineral wealth.

ZULUS, a section of the Bantu family which originally occupied the N.E. seaboard of Africa from Delagoa Bay to the Great Fish River; they are a race of superior physique and intellectual endowment, as well as moral temperament, and incline to a quiet pastoral life, they were attacked under Cetshwayo by the English in 1879, but after falling upon an English force at Isandula, and cutting it in pieces, were overpowered at Ulundi, and put to rout.

ZUMPT, KARL, philologist, born in Berlin, and professor at the University; edited a number of the Latin classics, and is best known by his Latin Grammar (1792-1849).

ZURBARAN, FRANCISCO, Spanish painter, born in Extremadura; did mostly religious subjects; his chief work is an altar-piece in Seville, where he lived and worked (1599-1662).

ZÜRICH, a northern canton in Switzerland, and the second largest, is in the basin of the Rhine, with a well-cultivated fertile soil, and manufactures of cottons and silks, and with a capital of the same name at the foot of the Lake of Zurich; a large manufacturing and trading centre; has a Romanesque cathedral and a university, with silk mills and cotton mills, as well as foundries and machine shops; here Lavater was born and Zwingli was pastor.

ZURITA, JERONIMO, Spanish historian, born in Saragossa; appointed official historiographer of Aragon, he made his name as one of the earliest Spanish historians, his work being characterised by accuracy and soundness of judgment; wrote "Annals of the Crown of Aragon" (1512-1580).

ZUTPHEN, manufacturing town in the Dutch province of Guelderland, in the neighbourhood of which Sir Philip Sidney fell wounded in a skirmish.

ZWICKAU, a town in Saxony, in a division of the same name, 82 m. S.W. of Dresden; it is in the midst of rich beds of coal, and has a number of manufactures.

ZWINGLI, ULRICH, the Swiss Reformer, born in Wildhaus, in the canton of St. Gall, and founder of the Reformed Church; studied at Berne and Vienna, afterwards theology at Basel, and was appointed pastor at Glarus; he got acquainted with Erasmus at Basel, and gave himself to the study of Greek, and in particular the epistles of St. Paul; attached to the monastery of Einsiedeln, he, in 1516, attacked the sale of indulgences, and was in 1518 elected to be preacher in the cathedral of Zurich; his preaching was attended with an awakening, and the bishop of Constance tried to silence him, but he was silenced himself in a public debate with the Reformer, the result of which was the abolition of the Mass and the dispensation instead of the Lord's Supper; the movement thus begun went on and spread, and Zwingli met in conference with Luther, but they failed to agree on the matter of the Eucharist, and on that point the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches separated; in 1531 the Catholic cantons declared war against the reformers of Zurich and Berne, and the latter were defeated at Cappel, among the dead on the battlefield being the Reformer, whose last words were, "They may kill the body, but not the soul" (1484-1531). See LUTHERANS.

ZWOLLE, a manufacturing town in the Dutch province of Overijssel, 50 m. N.E. of Amsterdam; close to it is Agnetenberg, famous as the seat of the monastery where Thomas a Kempis lived and died.

ZYMASE, the substance in yeast which causes the fermentation of sugar in the manufacture of alcohol.

ZYMOTIC DISEASES, diseases of a contagious nature, presumed to be due to some virus or organism which acts in the system like a ferment.

ZYRIANS, a tribe of Finnish origin scattered in the Archangel district and in Siberia.

ACRATES, the personification of incontinence.—The Faerie Queene, Spenser.

ACRES, BOB, a blustering braggart whose course "sized out of his fingers' ends" when put to the test, the rival of Beverley (Capt. Absolute) for the hand of Lydia Languish.—The Rivals, Sheridan.

ADAM, the old retainer who follows Orlando (q.v.) into the Forest of Arden; a type of the loyal, devoted man-servant.—As You Like It, Shakespeare.

ADAMASTOR, the spirit of the Cape of Storms (Cape of Good Hope).—The Lusiad, Camoens.

ADAMS, PARSON, a simple-minded and pious clergyman, possessed of much learning, but with little knowledge of the world.—Joseph Andrews, Fielding.

ADIELA, the wife of the sultan, who treats an ambassador from a neighbouring kingdom with cruelty and is discomfited by (Sir) Artegal and changed into a tiger; is the personification of injustice.—The Faerie Queene, Spenser.

ADMIRABLE CRICHTON, THE, a butler in the service of the Earl of Loom, the perfection of an "upper man-servant"; when, with members of the Earl's family, he is wrecked on a desert island it is he who alone rises to the occasion; from being "king" of the island he reverts naturally to his former position on the party being rescued.—The Admirable Crichton, Sir J. M. Barrie.

ADON-AL, the spirit of love and beauty.—Zanoni, Lord Lytton.

ADRIANA, a lady of Ephesus, wife of Antipholus, who nags the latter on the matter of unfaithfulness.—The Comedy of Errors, Shakespeare.

ADRIANA, a lady in love with a squire named Amias, from whom she is parted by the wiles of a monster; she is released by Belphoebe and united to her lover.—The Faerie Queene, Spenser.

ADRIANA, the mother of the twins named Antipholus, one of whom married Adriana (q.v.); parted from her sons by shipwreck, she goes to Ephesus and becomes abbess of a convent there; unknown to her one of the twins is a powerful citizen of Ephesus; the other, with Egeon, lands in Ephesus later, and all are brought together when the strange story of their lives is unfolded.—The Comedy of Errors, Shakespeare.

AFRICAN MAGICIAN, THE, the wizard who in the story of Aladdin leads the latter to the cave in quest of the wonderful lamp; later he deprives Aladdin of the lamp by a trick and transports its former possessor and his palace to Africa, but is subsequently killed by Aladdin.—The Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

AGED, THE, the father of John Wemmick, who resides in his son's "castle" at Walworth; a very old man, cheerful but extremely deaf.—Great Expectations, Dickens.

AGIB, the Third Calender, whose adventures are related from his shipwreck to his flight to Baghdad.—The Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

AGNES, the unsophisticated girl whom M. Armand keeps in seclusion, with a view to making her his wife, until a youth (Horace) awakens her love and carries her off.—L'Ecole des Femmes, Molière.

AGNES, the daughter of Mr Wickfield, the solicitor, whom David Copperfield married after the death of Dora (q.v.).—David Copperfield, Dickens.

AGRAVAIN, SIR, son of King Lot of Orkney, nephew of King Arthur, and brother of Gawain, Gaheris, and Gareth; was killed by Lancelot, when he had otherwise tried to trap him in an intrigue with Queen Guinevere.—Morte d'Arthur, Malory.

AGUECHEER, SIR ANDREW, an old fop who is the boon companion of Sir Toby Belch (q.v.).—Twelfth Night, Shakespeare.

AHMED, PRINCE, the possessor of the magic tent and the apple of Samarkand which cured all diseases.—The Arabian Nights' Entertainments.
